of the School Board whom he now saw on the Government Benches. He referred particularly to his noble Friend who followed him in the Education Department (Viscount Sandon), who had worked very hard, and who, he had no doubt, would be able to give the House a good deal of information upon the matter, and his right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. W. H. Smith), who, they all knew, had gained the good opinion of all classes in London by the work which he had done in connection with that Board. He (Mr. W. E. Forster) was, perhaps, more than anybody else, responsible for the School Board of London. He was, therefore, watching its proceedings with the greatest possible interest, not to say anxiety, remembering what a tremendous work it had to accomplish. The hon. Gentleman who brought forward the Motion said very little on what he (Mr. W. E. Forster) should have thought would have been an important matter; inasmuch as, while the hon. Gentleman thought it necessary for that House to protect the ratepayers of that great Metropolis against their own representatives,* he seemed to forget the very existence of the ratepayers themselves. At any rate, he did not assume that they were intelligent persons, well acquainted with the affair which was now brought before the House, that they were the people who paid the rates on whom this heavy tax lay, and who lived in the very centre of the intelligence of the Kingdom. They had plenty of newspapers, and plenty of gentlemen like the hon. Member who could state these matters to them in meeting after meeting. Was it necessary that the House of Commons should be called on to impose fresh checks on this Board, when the ratepayers had the best possible check already—which they had not in that House—namely, that the Board was only elected for three years, and it was in the power of the ratepayers of London, if they did not like their proceedings, to turn out their educational Parliament? He thought the hon. Gentleman ought really to have shown why it was they should protect the ratepayers against their own representatives. How did they know that the 3,000,000 or 4,000,000 composing the Metropolis would thank the House for stepping in, in the manner indicated by the hon.

Gentleman. It would be to say to the ratepayers—"We do not consider you are capable of doing your own business, and therefore we will do it for you." It was interesting to see, considering what a large portion of the Kingdom the Metropolis represented, how educational work had been going on there for the last few years. He (Mr. W. E. Forster) did not deny that this debate was likely to be of use; but the hon. Gentleman had stated only one side of the case. There was no harm in that side of the case being strongly stated after all, and it would afford good material for discussion in every vestry and public meeting before the next election. Expenditure had been mentioned for which this House was not responsible; but he did not think in any debate on Supply the House had seen such interest as was manifested on the other side. There was this difference—hon. Gentlemen were responsible in one case, but not in the other. The hon. Gentleman who had brought forward the Motion must excuse him if he did not go through all the items of expenditure to which he had referred; but he must not suppose that the charges which he made were unanswerable. It was easy for any gentleman to take hold of a large expenditure, and condemn it; but it was not easy, without notice, to be able to reply to any allegations that might be made. One or two of the items referred to by the hon. Gentleman, however, struck him as curious. The hon. Gentleman alluded to 400 guineas having been spent on a carpet. He (Mr. W. E. Forster) was informed, however, that this £400 for a carpet was an absolute delusion. He really hoped the House would look at the question with some sort of comparison in their own minds as to what had to be done. The Education Act was brought in in 1870. It was wanted in many parts of the Kingdom; but nowhere was it so much wanted as in London, because there was no part of the United Kingdom in which elementary education had been so much neglected. He was so impressed with the fact that he knew not how to deal with it. In fact, he at one time thought it would be impossible to put the Act in force in the Metropolis, and he thought they should have had to wait until its advantages had been shown elsewhere, and then get it applied to London; but there were others—his right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty, and the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. W. M. Torrens) were among them—who had better courage, and they encouraged him (Mr. W. E. Forster) to include London in the Education Act, which he did. The result was, that in no part of England had the people more completely met the Government, acknowledging the want, and determined to do their best. An educational Parliament was, therefore, made for London—the School Board—which the House was now asked to check. The House should not forget what it was—a Parliament chosen by the freest possible suffrage—by the whole population of the Metropolis. Some respect ought, therefore, to be paid to it. It was elected by a population of 3,500,000, and was composed of very eminent persons. There was Lord Lawrence, its first Chairman; there was its present President, Sir Charles Reed, well known in that House for his ability, who had devoted almost every hour of his time for days and years to this matter. No one would deny that the ablest and most philanthropic men in London—and women too—had come forward in connection with this work, and had received the confidence of the enormous population of London. In 1871, when the School Board was formed, what was the state of things? Why, elementary education was required in the Metropolis for at least 560,000 children; but there were only places in efficient schools for 260,000 children, and the number of children on the register was 222,000, while the average attendance was under 175,000. He (Mr. W. E. Forster) must ask the House to consider what that meant. And yet the hon. Member now came forward, and said—"Stop this work; don't build any more schools." But he (Mr. Forster) contended that the work had not been completed yet, although a great deal of good had been done. Last year, on the other hand, the number of children on the register was 444,000, and the average attendance had risen to 350,000. That fact showed, as he said, that the work was still far from complete, although the number of children on the educational roll had been doubled since the passing of the Education Act; and he wanted the hon. Member to take notice of this fact—that the proportion of the average attendance of children to school accommodation now was much larger, and not smaller, as he would seem to suppose. The average attendance now was about double what it was in 1870; but the school accommodation had nothing like doubled. There were still, he believed, from 150,000 to 200,000 children to be provided for. The hon. Baronet the Member for South Shropshire (Sir Baldwin Leighton) seemed to think that the Board schools were filled out of the voluntary schools, and he mentioned the cases of individual schools; but he (Mr. W. E. Forster) thought they ought not to go into individual cases in the consideration of the question. It might actually be as the hon. Baronet said; but the only safe ground to go upon was general results, and what were these? Since 1870 the average attendance at voluntary schools, so far from diminishing, had increased from 173,000 to 184,000, or 11,000, and 90 efficient schools, with an average attendance of 18,000, had chosen to transfer themselves to the School Board. That was to say, since 1870, the average attendance at voluntary schools had increased by 29,000. The chief reason of that increase was because more parents, when they found that they had to send their children to school, sent them to voluntary schools rather than to Board schools. That, then, brought up the question of compulsion, and he wished to say a word in reply to hon. Members who had spoken upon this question. It was an entire mistake to suppose that the School Board was not doing its utmost to bring in, or that it was not successful in bringing in, the poorest children. No doubt, if any hon. Gentleman chose to seek for them, uneducated children might still be found in the purlieus of the East End or of Westminster. The work, he would admit, was not yet complete. There were not places enough for all the children to bring them into. But, for his own part, he was perfectly astonished at the extent to which the School Board had succeeded in its work. It was supposed that the Board had not endeavoured to get the children; but he contended that this was not the case, as the following facts would prove:—During the first portion of the year 1878, which was the latest period for which Returns were given, the School Board, in the first place, sent out a caution to 32,529 parents who had neglected to send their children to school; an attendance of 24,497 was immediately secured. Notices were afterwards sent to 22,738 parents, with good result in more than 18,000 cases. The actual number of summonses issued was 3,705; a small fine was imposed in 2,340 cases, and the number of summonses dismissed was only three. He did not mean to say that in all these cases they had been right in summoning, for he had seen one or two cases in which he thought the Board ought not to have prosecuted. But it was impossible for all officers to be infallible; and, on the whole, he approved of the measures that had been taken to insure a higher attendance at school. He maintained that the very large increase in the voluntary schools had been mainly owing to the compulsion, which enabled the Board to put more scholars into them than was the case before. He was, indeed, quite sure there would not be in London the feeling which still existed in favour of compulsion, if the provisions as to compulsion had not, on the whole, been well applied. With regard to the ragged schools. He believed an average attendance of 10,000 children at the ragged schools had been transferred to the Board schools. It was a great mistake to suppose that, generally speaking, the children attending the ragged schools were not now attending the Board schools, for they were; and what showed real ability on the part of the Board was that, whereas the children did not pay fees in the ragged schools, they did pay some small fees in the Board schools. He hoped the House would excuse him for occupying its time while he had endeavoured to show what was the state of things in 1870, and what it was now; how much had been done, and what was still to be done. And now he came to the question of cost. The hon. Member for East Gloucestershire used very strong words about the cost being enormous. The times were bad, and rates were heavy, and many ratepayers on reading the remarks to-morrow morning would think that their rates were school rates, and that in consequence of the School Board business they were called upon to pay very heavy rates. What was the rate after all? It was 5½*d.* in the pound. What proportion did that bear to all the rates? As far as he (Mr. W. E. Forster) could make out, the average rates throughout the Metropolis were at least 5*s.*, judging from the lowest total rate in Marylebone, of 4*s.*, to the highest in Greenwich, of 6*s.* 5*d.* The hon. Member said he wished that the School Board rate was given separate from the rest, and in that wish he (Mr. W. E. Forster) quite concurred; and this he said, too—that if it could be proved that in the effort to put a stop to the ignorance which had been the curse of the Metropolis there had been extravagance, that extravagance should be stopped. He believed when the ratepayer saw the school rate, and knew what schooling meant, in diminishing the poor rate and the police rate, and compared it with the other rates, he did not think the school rate would be the first to suffer. The precept for the School Board for 1879 was £551,000; while that for the Metropolitan Board of Works was, besides the coal dues, the rate £582,000. He would say a word about sites, as he did not think the hon. Member had fairly put the question. Ten schools had been taken from the centre of London, and he (Mr. W. E. Forster) thought ten exceptional schools ought not to have been taken. He believed he was right in saying there were 161 schools, the accounts of which had been completed. The cost of those sites was rather more than £5 per head, the cost of furniture 10*s.* per head, and the cost of building just about £10; so that it was about £15 per head. In fact, the cost for all purposes had not exceeded £16 per head. Therefore, he did not believe, if there was a thorough examination into the matter, that it would be found the School Board had been extravagant as to sites. Then, as to maintenance, it was, no doubt, somewhat dearer than in the voluntary schools, and he believed it would continue to be so, for rate work could scarcely be expected to be cheaper at the outset than voluntary management. If they could have gone on working on the voluntary system, and got the people of England educated by it, that would have done very well; but they could not do it. Certainly, the voluntary system might be carried out more cheaply, and that was one reason why he had been anxious to keep the voluntary schools in operation; for he knew there was care bestowed and work done by the managers which would probably have to be paid for elsewhere. Then, it must also be recollected that the managers of voluntary schools, especially in large cities, did not put up their schools with the notion of supplying the educational wants of the Metropolis. That was not their primary notion. Their principal aim was to have a school connected with their own Church or denomination—a very praiseworthy object; but they erected the school just where it suited them to do it. They picked their place for the school, and they had also, to some extent, picked the children. But the School Board could not do the one or the other, and that made some difference. Certainly, the average in London was higher for Board schools than in other parts of the Kingdom; but he thought there might be an explanation for it. London was a dearer place than the rest of the country. It cost more to live in London than in provincial towns; therefore, he should expect the general expenses of schools would be higher than elsewhere. The very fact that there was an enormous work to be undertaken; that there were 350,000 children untaught, who were to be brought within the operation of the Act; and that there was no time to wait while so great a number of children were being left untaught, would naturally add to the expense. The schools had to be started, and masters and mistresses found for them. If any man chose to go into any manufacturing town and start there an enormous mill, he must expect to have to pay rather more than the market rates for overlookers and managers. And so it was with the London School Board, which had to start an enormous educational machinery. It was ordered to do it; it was its duty to do it, and that, too, at a time when expenses were rising. Under those circumstances, when a demand suddenly sprung up for teachers, no doubt, a good deal had to be paid; and, as he was just reminded by a right hon. Friend, it was done at a most expensive time. But the London School Board, likewise, had a great deal of work to do which the voluntary schools did not do, and which the school boards generally had not done. He dared say the hon. Gentleman opposite would insist that it should not have its Inspectors. It must be remembered, however, that there were 200,000 children in the schools; and, therefore, the ratepayers had a right to demand that there should be Inspectors, irrespective of the Government Inspectors. Again, the School Board had taken very expensive work in hand in dealing with special cases. He alluded to the teaching of the destitute deaf and dumb and the blind. The hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. J. R. Yorke) had brought forward several instances of alleged extravagance connected with the Staff. He seemed to think it a terrible thing that the needlework Inspector—the chief superintendent, it was to be supposed, of the needlework for about 100,000 girls—received £175 a-year. That, however, struck him (Mr. W. E. Forster) as a very small sum indeed, and one uncommonly well spent; and he trusted that when the House voted money they might do it, generally speaking, on as favourable terms. It should not be forgotten, therefore, that the School Board had done work which neither voluntary schools nor other school boards had performed. His impression was that the School Board had had to do things in which it was most difficult to be economical. When the London School Board was compared with voluntary schools, or other Board schools, it must be remembered that it took under its charge the deaf and dumb and the blind children of the Metropolis requiring help. Then, as to the case of the training-ship, he dared say that was a mistake. He knew nothing about it. But, perhaps it might be found that there was no more over-expenditure on that training-ship than on many of the ships for which the House was more responsible; and it was quite possible that that might be a warning and a lesson to the London School Board for the future. But, however that might be, it did not require a Resolution of Parliament to bring home that matter to the ratepayers of London. On the other hand, it was possible that when the case of the training-ship was brought before the tribunal of the ratepayers, there might be some defence offered of which they had not yet heard. He now came to the salaries of the teachers. He wished to take as impartial a view of them as he could. It was quite true that those salaries stood at a higher average in London than in the Kingdom generally—£132 for masters, £102 for mistresses, and £100 for infant school-mistresses, were considerably more than the sums paid in voluntary schools and in other Board schools. But there were, as compared with the voluntary schools, no residences. In the case of the masters, therefore, he did not think the salaries—£132, as compared with £117 in voluntary schools—extravagantly high. With regard to the mistresses, however, the matter was different; but it should be remembered that the salaries paid by the voluntary schools before were far too low—namely, an average of £67, added to which was the fact that they had a very rough lot of children to deal with when the Education Act was passed. He was glad, however, that Sir Charles Reed was aware that the salaries would have to be looked into. But his (Mr. W. E. Forster's) sympathy with the masters and mistresses was so great, and his feeling that they had long been a neglected class was so strong, that he could not bring himself to regret that their salaries had been raised throughout the Kingdom. He hoped, however, that neither the teachers nor their paymasters would forget that salaries must be regulated on the principle of supply and demand. In the beginning there was a great demand; but he thought, for some time to come, the masters and mistresses might have to look forward to smaller pay. Sir Charles Reed said that one of the first tasks of the School Board would be to revise the scale of salaries of the teachers. He wished to make one or two suggestions to the School Board, if he might be permitted to do so. He believed that what had been the chief ground of their expenditure, over and above that of the voluntary schools, was not so much that they had paid their teachers a higher rate of wages, but that they had a much larger number of them—more, he submitted, than might be necessary for the requirements; and he suggested that this matter should now receive very full consideration. No doubt, it was necessary to have a large number at the time of the passing of the Act, in consequence of the numbers of neglected children that were brought in out of the streets, and not from other schools, in a large Metropolis like London. On the other hand, it might be argued that the larger teaching power had been justified to a great extent by the result; because, though the children had been so neglected before, yet the passes in the London Board Schools were above the average in the voluntary schools. There was another point which he thought might also be considered by the Board, and that was the fees of the children. The voluntary schools got an average of 13s. per child; the average of the Board schools was rather under 8s. He hoped the Board would be encouraged from their success in getting a fee out of the ragged school children, though of only 1d., to try to raise the average fee of the other children. The average fee in the London Board schools was about 2d., which was below the average in the large towns, and, taking the whole of the Metropolis together, he did not know why that should be so. There was another suggestion he would make, which was that the Board should try more than they had done the system of a gradation of schools. In West Ham the system worked very well, for there there was a school with a 1d., a school with a 2d., and a school with a 4d. rate, and he did not see why they should not get as much as 9d. A word or two now about the checks which the hon. Gentleman the Member for East Gloucestershire would introduce. There was one great check which the Act had established—namely, that the people who paid the money elected the persons who spent it. But as to the checks proposed to be introduced, he (Mr. W. E. Forster) took down some of the proposals made at a conference of delegates from the Vestries. He saw that the hon. Gentleman was making arrangements for introducing a deputation from this conference to the Lord President; but he must say that he had never expected to find that the hon. Gentleman would support these proposals. The first was that the rate should be limited; the second, that all School Board buildings should be stopped—that was, that the educational deficiency should be left unsupplied; and the third, that in the rate schools there should be no rate-paid teaching except for the three R's; that the rest should be paid for by the parents; and, further, that smaller State grants should be made to the rate schools than to the voluntary schools, which would soon cause an outcry to be raised by the representatives of the ratepayers throughout the Metropolis. For himself, he had no fear that the Government would offer such checks as had been suggested, or that the people would accept them. There had been a good deal of talk about the rate being more than was at first mentioned, and he quite granted that the expenses had been somewhat beyond what he had expected. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself, in any proposed estimate, or, indeed, anyone else who set to work to build a house, would find that the outlay which he had to incur was not always that which he anticipated. If, however, the ratepayers of London were to compare their position with that of the inhabitants of any of the other large towns throughout the country, they would find that, generally speaking, their rate was lower. Then they came to the question of starving the education. The hon. Gentleman said that as soon as the child had learned to read, write, and cipher, in a very elementary manner, it should be turned out of the school, unless his parents were prepared to pay more money for him. Could they fully estimate what that meant?—that they were not to have a knowledge of geography, history, or even of such subjects as that of elementary social economy, which, although the hon. Gentleman seemed to have laughed at it, might be found very useful to the working classes. A parent might have been paying for the education of his child up to the age of 10, and was quite willing that he should go on to the age of 13 or 14; but if so, the hon. Gentleman would have him pay extra. That, however, was a proposal which it would be impossible to work; and he must say in that, and other matters brought forward, he took an entirely different view from that of the hon. Gentleman. He had very little more to add. He did not mean to contend that the men who had been members of the School Board had made no mistakes. He did not mean to say that, having a very difficult work to do, they had always done it as cheaply as might have been the case; but he would say he believed they might search the whole Kingdom through, and they would not find any better work done either by Imperial or local officials. However, he hoped they would look to economy for the future—[“Hear, hear!”]—Yes, he would repeat, he hoped they would look to economy in the future; but he also trusted that, in doing so, they would never lose sight of the fact that their main duty was to provide for education. He thought it was probable they might be able to do things cheaper hereafter; but he would say again, you might search through the Kingdom, and you would not find a better return for the money spent—5½d. in the pound—anywhere than the hard work done by the London School Board. It was done by the indomitable, self-denying energy of those men and women who had been upon this Board. Their work was unpaid. It was not only unpaid, but obscure and unthanked; but he trusted that they would not be discouraged, and that they would go on with their work. And, after all, it was the population, the ratepayers, the parents of this Metropolis, who had to judge whether they did this work or not. He had no fear whatever that they would stop this work, or that that House would interfere to put checks upon the Board which the ratepayers did not wish to have put.

Mr. W. E. Forster

Mr. W. E. Forster

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON did not think anyone could be surprised at the Motion now brought forward, for it did give expression to a feeling of disquietude which certainly did exist at the expenditure of the London School Board. His hon. Friend, in a singularly able and exhaustive speech, made a series of allegations which, if true, were the justification for his Motion; while, if further justification were required, it would be found in the speech to which they had just listened. The right hon. Gentleman commenced his observations by rather deprecating the interference of that House with the London School Board. They had constituents, and therefore it was hardly the business of the House to interfere between them and their constituents, they were told. But if there had not been that Motion in the House, they would not have heard the opinion that for the future the Board must practise economy; while this theory, that no one must interfere between a majority and its constituents, applied not only to local but to Imperial matters; and, certainly, the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends, during the past five years, had not at all brought their conduct into accord with this precept. In fact, that argument must have been invented on the spur of the moment; because it must be remembered that this expenditure did not merely affect the ratepayers of London, but the fees and salaries affected every single elementary school everywhere, and that the raising of salaries in London had practically raised them throughout the whole of England. Before making any observations on the expenditure of the School Board, he would ask the House to bear in mind two facts. With the first point the right hon. Gentleman had already dealt. He (Lord George Hamilton) was one of those Metropolitan Members who suggested, in 1870, that there should be one Central Board for the Metropolis. After their experience of the past few years, they could say that if a School Board had been set up in any other way it would have been almost impossible to work it. The artificial boundaries of the different parishes were difficult to ascertain; and it would have been almost impossible for each Board, with different bye-laws and different officers and children constantly passing over the boundaries from one parish to another, and from one school to another, to get satisfactorily to work. It did not escape the attention of those who recommended the creation of the London School Board that a power would be placed in the hands of that Board of levying rates such as had never been given to any local authority before. His hon. Friend had alluded to the high salaries of some of the officers of the Central Office. No doubt, they would seem high if paid by any Board but London. But the London School Board had under its jurisdiction a population almost identical in number with the total population of Scotland, and the rateable value of London exceeded by £2,000,000 the whole rateable value of Scotland. Therefore, it was only just and fair that they should make allowances for the great difficulties with which the London School Board had to contend. They had this enormous population put under their control; they were asked to furnish school accommodation for that population, among the children being a large proportion of what were called "wastrels;" they had the greatest possible difficulty in acquiring sites, and there were a variety of other difficulties in their way. It was impossible not to be struck with the ability and devotion with which they had carried out their work, to say nothing of the munificence with which individual members of the Board had shown that they were ready, out of their own pockets, to make donations for promoting the cause of education. He also entirely agreed with what was said about the Chairman of the Board (Sir Charles Reed). He was very well known, personally, to the House; his experience had been of the greatest use to his colleagues, and to his influence was, in a great measure, to be attributed the fact that the religious difficulty had been so satisfactorily settled. At all the Board schools at the present time religious instruction was given, and every year a greater number of children were participating in the instruction so given. All these things must be taken into consideration before they began to criticize the expenditure. They must also remember that the Board was not responsible for the system of education they had to carry out. The system was imposed upon them by the Legislature; and the House might be quite certain if there had been extravagance it was, to a certain extent, the result of a system which the Legislature imposed. This matter was of so much importance that, although the hour was rather late, he hoped the House would allow him to lay a few figures before them, especially as only by that means could they arrive at a conclusion whether the expenditure was justifiable or successful. The London School Board had a population and a rateable value very nearly equivalent to that of Scotland. The number of schools under their control was 257, as against 2,334 in Scotland; and the number of certificated and pupil teachers, respectively, in London was 1,950 and 2,250, as against 3,870 and 3,850 in Scotland. Not only were there a far larger number of schools, but there were also a far larger number of teachers in Scotland; and, therefore, the comparison was favourable to London, and it ought to be able to educate children more cheaply than in Scotland. But, on the contrary, he found the total cost of the maintenance of each child in a London school, exclusive of the cost of site, building, &c., and counting only teaching staff, books, and apparatus, for 1877-8, was £2 13s. 5d.; while in Scotland it was but £2 2s. But the amount expended out of the rates per child in London was £1 11s. 11d., while in Scotland it was but 14s. 5d.

Mr. W. E. Forster

In one sense the result was creditable to the London School Board, because their earnings per child were 14s. 4d., while the rate in Scotland was over 16s. Therefore, not only was the system of education, as might be expected, more efficient, but, as regarded the results, it was also considerably cheaper. What, then, was the cause of this very heavy expenditure? It might be divided into two heads—that which related to the supply of schools and the general administration of schools, and that which related to the supply of children. With regard to the supply of schools, he had looked very carefully into the figures himself; and he could assure his hon. Friend that, so far from the supply of schools being excessive, there was, at the present moment, a considerable deficiency. He could prove that easily. At the present moment there were on the rolls of the Board and voluntary schools 600,000 children, while there was accommodation in the schools themselves for but 472,000 children; so that there was clearly a deficiency of school accommodation of 128,000 places. Moreover, London was annually increasing its population; and, therefore, if the building of schools were stopped the number of places wanted must continue to increase. It was, therefore, he thought, quite clear that unless that House chose to reverse the fundamental principle of the Act of 1870—that every district should provide sufficient school accommodation for the children in it—it was quite clear that the supply of schools must be increased. Therefore, so far as the supply of schools was concerned, he thought that part of the expenditure must continue to increase. It was absolutely impossible to think of enacting that London alone, of all the districts in England, should have an educational deficiency; and it would be an everlasting monument of parsimony and impotence that the richest capital in the world should be unable to supply sufficient school accommodation for her children. As to the question whether the supply of schools could be accomplished at a less cost than in the past, the correspondence between the Education Department and the Board was in the hands of hon. Members. No doubt, in certain cases, the expenditure had been excessive; but the attention of the Board had been called to the fact, and he was quite certain that the members of the Board would co-operate, as far as they could, to reduce the cost of building new schools. It was then, on the one hand, perfectly clear that the number of Board schools in London must increase; and, on the other, that the expenditure in connection with the supply of these schools and the general administration must also increase. One therefore turned with more interest to that part of the expenditure which related to the maintenance of the children in the schools; because it was perfectly clear if there were to be more schools, and the charge for the maintenance of the children was not to decrease, that there was literally no limit to the amount which the London School Board would have to levy upon the rates, in order to meet the deficiency arising between the fees and their general expenditure. The cost of maintenance, comparatively, was as follows:—The average in the voluntary schools throughout England was £1 14s., the average of the board schools throughout England was £2 1s.; but the average of the London School Board was £2 13s. 5d. These figures were not satisfactory, and it could not be contended that they were the necessary result of low fees; because in Birmingham, where there were more schools with low fees in proportion to the others than in any other town in the Kingdom, the expenditure was kept within £2 per head. On examining the Estimates of the London School Board, it was very easy to ascertain the cause of this expenditure. Since this Notice had been put on the Paper he had made it his duty very closely to criticize their figures; and he thought they would startle the House, as they had startled him. He found that the average cost of maintenance in the school per child was £2 14s. 7d.; and the average fees, taking all the board schools, was 7s. 6d. per head. A considerable deduction had to be made from that, because all the books, papers, and stationery were provided gratis. They amounted to 4s. 7d., and, deducting that from the fees, they arrived at the astounding result that the average cost of a child in a London School Board school was about £2 10s., and the average contribution from that child in fees was 2s. 11d., or much less than 1d. per week. But in a considerable number of schools the children only paid 1d. per week, and were provided gratis with books, papers, and stationery. The result, again, was then that the average fee paid by all the children was less than 1*d.* per week, and that no fee whatever was paid in many schools. Of course, he knew certain hon. Gentlemen in that House were in favour of free education. It must be remembered, however, that such was not the intention of the Act. Its intention was to place within reach of the parent a sound and cheap education; but it was not the intention of the rate-payers to give free education. What would naturally occur to many hon. Gentlemen was, whether it was necessary to impose such very low fees? Were the conditions of life so exceptional as to necessitate these very low fees? A School Board alluded to by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. W. E. Forster)—that of West Ham—afforded a good answer to the question. It was a large urban district, and what was necessary in London they might assume would be necessary there. Yet there the cost, in 1877, was £2 3*s.* 3*d.* per child; and in 1878, £1 19*s.* 11*d.*; the amount obtained from the Government being quite equal to that obtained by the London School Board. Not only, then, was that system quite as efficient, but it was much cheaper. One cause of this greater expense was the number and the salaries of the teachers employed. Nobody objected to the teachers being adequately remunerated; but certain figures laid on the Table seemed to show that the average salaries of teachers in London were considerably higher than those paid elsewhere. Thus, there were 42 teachers whose salary was between £250 and £300; 26 under £300; 16 between £300 and £325; 7 at £325; 2 at £350; and 1 at £467. The question at once arose, was it necessary to pay these very high salaries; or was it to be considered whether parents could not afford to pay more than 1*d.*? A very able letter on that subject appeared in The Times from Mr. Rodgers, the Vice Chairman of the Board. He said—

Lord George Hamilton

"It is urged by some that we ought not to pay a teacher more than his market price. But we want the best teachers for London, and we ought to have them, and we should, therefore, pay them above the market price."

He did not wish to put too severe an interpretation on that expression; but, unquestionably, the result of the salaries paid by the London School Board had been to raise teachers' salaries all over England; and one of the great difficulties the small School Boards and districts had had to encounter in the rural districts during the last two years had been the getting teachers to accept the salaries they could afford to pay. Therefore, this paying more than the market value in London affected very hardly the rate-payers elsewhere, besides affecting the managers of the voluntary schools. That was another point which would account for the very high expenditure in the London School Board schools. He did not think that a system of low fees with very highly-trained teachers, whose salaries depended on the results of the examinations, were in any way incompatible. But what was the result in these schools? The teacher knew he was dependent upon the result. The better-dressed child; the child which was higher in the social scale, the better educated, the more intelligent, the better for his purpose; and, therefore, this system made the teacher eager to get hold of the very class of children for whom these schools were not intended. It was only fair to the School Board to say that they were endeavouring to alter this, and so to fix the salaries that a less portion of the teacher's remuneration might be dependent on the results of the examination. The question naturally asked, then, was—Is the cause of this very high rate of maintenance in the London schools entirely the fault of the School Board; or is it the natural consequence of the legislation of nine years ago? It must be remembered, also, that the annual grant was not given under the same conditions, and for the same purposes, as it was 10 or 12 years ago. Then it was given, according to the Code—

"To promote local voluntary effort, and in order to extend education among the working classes."

When the Act of 1870 was first introduced, the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. W. E. Forster) made a proposal which would have obviated many of the difficulties which subsequently occurred, and it was that each district should be responsible for its school supply, and that no School Board should have the power of contributing to voluntary schools without the rates. That proposition was not palatable to the Party with which he was associated; it was withdrawn, and the right hon. Gentleman substituted a proposal by which an increase of 50 per cent was given both to voluntary as well as Board schools. The effect of the Acts of 1870 and 1876 was that compulsion extended throughout the greater part of England, and the children who were at the schools were not exclusively the children of the working classes. On the contrary, the Inspectors of the Education Department estimated that only one-seventh of the children of England had education provided for them otherwise than by elementary schools. The right hon. Gentleman opposite never attempted to define what was meant by elementary education; but, of course, the education of all children must be elementary, and the definition attached to an elementary school was a school where the fee did not exceed 9d. per week. Therefore, they had now drifted from a position in which the grant was given to promote local voluntary effort in extending education among the working classes, to a position where any person could send his child to an elementary school in which, provided the fees charged were not more than 9d. per week, a portion of the cost of that education would be defrayed by the State. That partly depended, of course, on the amount realized by the examinations. Power was given to the School Boards to raise rates for the purpose of extending education, the intention being that the rates were to be used in order to bring cheap education within the reach of those who could not afford to pay high fees. By cheap education was not meant education which should be very cheap to the child, but exceedingly dear to the ratepayer. Under the voluntary system, it was not necessary for the Education Department to place any limit on the expenditure of voluntary schools, because the balance came from private sources, and the managers knew that the larger the expenditure the better was the result of the examination; and, consequently, when the managers of the Board schools found out that by expending more money out of the rates upon the Board schools they could obtain a larger proportion of the Government grant, many of them felt justified in doing so, until, undoubtedly, the result of the system at the present moment was this—that certain School Boards—he did not say they did it intentionally—did dip their hands very deeply into the ratepayers' pockets, and so obtained a very large proportion of this grant from the Consolidated Fund. Now, he ventured to say, that was never the intention of the Legislature. The intention of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. E. Forster) and of the late Prime Minister was that in proportion as they increased the grant they should reduce the amount levied from the rates. If hon. Gentleman thought he was in any way exaggerating, let him just tell them what the results of the examination, compared with the rate of expenditure of the London School Board, had been during the last year. It was perfectly true that the results had been, in one sense, very creditable to the London School Board, because they had succeeded in reaching 15s. 4½d. in London, against 15s. 1½d. in other schools in England—that was to say, they had got 2½d. more than had been obtained for the children in other schools. But at what cost did they obtain this? Every one of those children had cost 17s. 8d. more to obtain that return; and, in order to get 2½d. more out of the grant, the rates had had to contribute 16s. 4d. to produce that result. The question was, whether it was necessary that they should bring the Board schools back to apply the rates in accordance with the intentions of Parliament? There were certain objects very clearly in view in this matter. In the first place, it would be most inexpedient if the House were to do anything which would in the slightest degree affect the efficiency of elementary education in this country. It must, again, be remembered that whoever was at the head of the Education Department had to exercise discretion between the Board schools and the voluntary schools; and although it might be possible to make such an exercise of that discretion as to favour a system to which he was personally favourable, yet he believed that such a course would not only be very improper, but very unwise. It would counteract against the system which it was supposed to favour, and must, undoubtedly, lead to zig-zag legislation that would be detrimental to the cause of education. Therefore, the Government had invariably endeavoured to lay down such lines of action as were consistent with justice and propriety, and which could be maintained by themselves, and with difficulty reversed by those who came after them. Now, keeping those objects fairly in view, let the House see whether they could possibly suggest any proposal to meet the undoubted evil which existed. There were some who suggested that the amount of the school fees should be reduced from 9*d.* to 6*d.*; and, further, that no school should be considered an elementary school which exceeded 6*d.*, because there was no doubt whatever that, at the present moment, a very large number of children belonging to the middle classes were educated in Board and voluntary schools with Government assistance, while their parents could perfectly afford to pay for them without any assistance. But it must be remembered that they could not prevent these children from attending these elementary schools, because everybody had a right to do so; and, therefore, the only result of that plan would be that whilst the scholars would continue to attend the fees payable by them would diminish. He could not but feel, himself, that in all large Board districts they must ultimately arrive at a system of graded schools, which would, he thought, tend to efficiency and economy. They could then apportion the teaching staff to the children who had to be instructed, and there were many other obvious advantages. Still, the time had not yet arrived when it would be justifiable for the Education Office to suggest that a general system of graded schools should take place throughout the country. In the first place, one great difference was very obvious. In many parishes and school districts in England there was only one school; and, therefore, it would not be possible to have graded schools. Then, he thought, before the House attempted to do anything in that direction, they should see what could be done by secondary schools in England; and there was no doubt whatever that year by year, under the scheme of the Endowed Schools Commissioners, an excellent system of secondary schools was being established. Well, if the House should reject those two proposals, there was another which he would suggest, and which seemed to him to exactly meet the difficulty. Suppose the House were to say that, in the opinion of the Education Department, the maintenance of schools, as elementary schools, should not exceed a certain sum, the Return showed that, with the single exceptions of London and Liverpool, the cost of the maintenance of all elementary schools in England was under £2 2*s.* per child per annum. Well, supposing it was provided that if the cost of the maintenance per child exceeded £2 2*s.*, the excess should be deducted from the grants given to the school, the result would be to show the managers of the schools the necessity of enforcing economy; and if they did not do so, it would be a question for the ratepayers to decide whether or not a limit should be imposed. This proposal had been under the consideration of the Education Department; and, without pledging himself in any way to the details, because the matter required most careful consideration, he thought he might say that the Government might act in that direction. This would effectually tend, he thought, to prevent managers from putting their hands too deeply into the rates in order to get the extra grants. It was perfectly ridiculous to say that the managers of schools had the option of spending as much as they chose of the taxes which were not collected by them. If this proposal were shortly put into practice, what would be the result as regarded London? Of course, it would be very difficult for a School Board at once to reduce its expenditure, and a certain time must be given; but if the first cost and maintenance of the London schools were reduced to £2 2*s.*, there would be an immediate saving of £100,000. That was the suggestion which, on behalf of the Government, he was ready to make. He hoped his hon. Friend, after this statement, would not consider it necessary to press his Motion to a Division. He (Lord George Hamilton) had indicated—and he thought the figures he had quoted showed—that there had been an expenditure on the part of the London School Board which did not seem to be altogether necessary; and, such being the case, he should not, therefore, vote against the Motion; but, on the other hand, it was equally impossible for him to vote for it. It must be remembered that the London School Board was by far the most important School Board in existence; and if the Education Department had any reason to find fault with the expenditure of the London School Board, the proper course would be to write to them, and not by a side wind, by a Motion of this sort, to inflict upon them censure. There were a variety of circumstances which made it undesirable, he thought, for his hon. Friend to push his Motion to a Division. He (Lord George Hamilton) was sorry that he should have detained the House at some length; and if they could so shape their proposal as to make it applicable to the whole of England, he did not think anyone would have cause to complain that it would, in the smallest degree, affect either the sufficiency or the efficiency of national education; but it would show the managers of schools that it never was, and was not now, the intention of Parliament that a great and unlimited use should be made of the rates in order to obtain a larger measure of money raised by taxation. He thought it would also be a distinct intimation to any manager or any Board who took a different view, and who believed that unlimited expenditure was advantageous to the cause of education, that no greater hindrance to the cause of national education could be devised than to make the progress of primary education dependent upon excessive dipping into the pockets of the ratepayers.

Lord George Hamilton

MR. MUNDELLA said, they had now arrived at a very late hour, yet not a single Metropolitan Member had had an opportunity of addressing the House, nor had any of the members of the School Board, who were also Members of that House, spoken. The statement of the noble Lord certainly, also, ought not to go without discussion and unchallenged. Therefore, he begged to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed.
"That the Debate be now adjourned."—
(Mr. Mundella.)

MR. J. R. YORKE said, he must distinctly oppose the Motion, unless it was understood that the adjournment was not to be sine die. If, however, the Government could not give him a day, he must take a Division on the question of the adjournment, in order to obtain an expression of opinion from the House as to the conduct of the School Board.

MR. FAWCETT would be heartily glad if the Government could give the hon. Member a day, for the more this subject was discussed the better for the future of education. But to take a Division on the adjournment would be thereby to decide what would, practically, be a vote of censure on the most important local representative body in the country, without its own representatives having been heard. As a matter of fact, at 1 o'clock they had had but four speeches, no member of the Board, or representing the Metropolis, having spoken. Under such circumstances, it would be taking the House at a disadvantage to force a Division.

MR. PELL said, he should vote for the Motion, not because he wished to condemn the conduct of individual members of the Board, who were the creatures of circumstances, but because he objected to the circumstances which placed them where they were.

MR. W. E. FORSTER thought the Motion for adjournment very reasonable. It would be most unwise to attempt to get a decision on the Main Question by dividing on the Motion for adjournment, because the case had not been nearly sufficiently debated. He should be very glad if the Government could give a day; but he feared that was not very likely at this period of the Session.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the Government were fully conscious of the importance of the issue raised, and the ability with which it had been debated; but, at the same time, he feared it was a debate which, at that period of the Session, they could not hope to bring to a satisfactory conclusion. The case brought forward not only raised the question as to the conduct of a particular School Board, but introduced the whole question of our educational system; while the statement by his noble Friend of the views of the Government ought itself to be the subject of further debate. It was, therefore, most reasonable that the debate should be adjourned. The Government would give a day with the greatest pleasure if they felt they could redeem their promise, but that was quite out of their power; and he could only express a hope that an opportunity would be found to resume the debate. The proposition intimated by his noble Friend must come under the attention of the House in another form, when there might be further opportunities for discussion. He did not think the Government could possibly resist the Motion for an adjournment.

Lord George Hamilton

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK hoped the hon. Member (Mr. J. R. Yorke) would not go to a Division, which would really indicate nothing, as those who voted for it could not be supposed to intend the condemnation of a body which had not even been heard in its own defence.

MR. PAGET considered it very unsatisfactory that the debate should be closed in this way; and, therefore, hoped the Government would give them an opportunity of considering the proposals brought forward for the first time by the noble Lord that day.

MR. RITCHIE hoped his hon. Friend would not go to a Division, for it would be most unsatisfactory to give a decision when the full case had not been heard, and when his hon. Friend himself had not had an opportunity of replying to the statements of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. W. E. Forster).

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL also agreed that a Division at that time would be liable to grave misconstruction; but still he thought they ought to have some sort of assurance from the Government that the subject would not be absolutely dropped.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON replied, that, so far from the subject being either dropped or forgotten, he proposed to lay Papers on the subject on the Table of the House.

Motion agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Monday next.

METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS (WATER EXPENSES) BILL.

On Motion of Sir JAMES M'GAREL HOGG, Bill to authorise the Metropolitan Board of Works to defray expenses incurred in relation to the promotion of certain Bills in Parliament relating to the supply of Water to the Metropolis, ordered to be brought in by Sir JAMES M'GAREL HOGG, Sir CHARLES W. DILKE, and Mr. RODWELL.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 204.]

House adjourned at a quarter after One o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 11th June, 1879.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—Contagious Diseases Acts, appointed and nominated.

PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Hours of Polling (Boroughs) [11], put off.

Select Committee—Report—Wormwood Scrubs Regulation [No. 223].

Third Reading—Metropolis (Little Coram Street, Bloomsbury, Wells Street, Poplar, and Great Peter Street, Westminster.) Improvement Provisional Orders Confirmation * [175]; Local Government (Highways) Provisional Orders (Dorset, &c.) * [186]; Local Government (Highways) Provisional Orders (Gloucester and Hereford) * [185]; Local Government Provisional Orders (Aspull, &c.) * [161], and passed.

Withdrawn—Bankruptcy (Scotland) * [59].

ORDER OF THE DAY.

HOURS OF POLLING (BOROUGHES) BILL.

(Mr. Chamberlain, Sir Charles W. Dilke, Dr. Cameron, Major Nolan, Mr. Mundella, Mr. Rathbone, Mr. Henry Samuelson.)

[BILL 11.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: The Bill I beg to ask the House to read a second time proposes to extend the hours of polling to 12—from 8 A.M. to 8 P.M.—in all boroughs. It extends to all boroughs in England and in Ireland, and applies to all elections—Parliamentary, municipal, and School Board. At the same time, I admit there may very well be established a distinction between large boroughs and small boroughs, where the circumstances are altogether different; and if it should be the opinion of the Government or of the House that that distinction should be made in the Bill, the promoters will be happy to accept any Amendment to that effect. Either a Schedule might be attached to the Bill in which the names might be placed of all boroughs in which the Bill should apply, or it might be provided that the Bill should only apply to boroughs having a certain population, or a discretion might be allowed, and the local officials might be permitted to arrange the hours of polling according to the circumstances and necessities of the case. I should like, before proceeding to the discussion of the measure, to call attention to the history of the question. It is certainly somewhat instructive, as showing the tendency of legislation and of the growing opinion of the House in favour of such a Bill. My hon. Friend (Sir Charles W. Dilke) was the first to call attention to the matter in 1871; but a more serious discussion of the whole subject took place in 1872, on the introduction of the Ballot Bill. I must say, on looking back to that time, it does exhibit an amount of vacillation and inconsistency on the part of the then Government in relation to that measure, which I should think is without parallel in Parliamentary history; for it appears the Bill was brought in by the Government providing that the poll should be open from 8 to 4, as at present, and when an Amendment was moved to extend the hours from 8 to 8, the Government voted against that Amendment, and it was consequently rejected; but observing, apparently, a strong feeling in favour of some extension, the Government proposed a compromise, which was that the hours should be from sunrise to sunset. Afterwards, however, they turned against their own proposition, and withdrew their support to the compromise they had suggested. It was certainly either withdrawn or rejected, and the Bill went up to the House of Lords in the present form of the law. In the House of Lords the Earl of Shaftesbury moved an Amendment in favour of keeping open the poll from 8 to 8, which was carried against the Government. Thereupon they brought in again that compromise of theirs, which appeared to be a stalking-horse to get over any difficulty with which they might find themselves confronted, and they proposed that the hours should be from sunrise to sunset. They carried that in a subsequent Sitting, and the Bill came down to the Commons in that form; but when it got into the Commons, that convenient compromise was again dropped by the Government, and no extension whatever was finally permitted. The next occasion on which reference was made to the subject was in 1874, when my hon. Friend (Sir Charles W. Dilke) brought in a Bill which was practically the same as that now before the House, except that it included the Metropolitan constituencies which are now already dealt with. That Bill was rejected by 201 to 126. That minority of 126 included almost all the Liberal Members who were present in the House, and there were only six Members sitting for Liberal constituencies who voted against it. The minority also included my right hon. Friend (Mr. W. E. Foster), the author of the Ballot Bill, whose support, therefore, I hope to obtain on the present occasion. Then, in 1877, my hon. Friend (Sir Charles W. Dilke) brought in a Resolution, according to which he proposed that the hours should be in the Metropolis from 8 to 8, and that in all other places a discretion should be reserved to local authorities, which, as I have already suggested, might be done in the present Bill. The Chancellor of the Exchequer stated that he had no objection to the principle of the measure, although he did object to the discretion so reserved, and, at his suggestion, the Bill was referred to a Committee. The Committee reported, during the same Session, in favour of the extension suggested in the Metropolitan constituencies; and in 1878 my hon. Friend accordingly brought in a Bill carrying into effect their suggestion, and he was rewarded for all the perseverance he had shown on the subject by carrying that Bill through the House without a Division. The Committee was re-appointed to consider the circumstances of the rest of the country. Let me say that the success of my hon. Friend very greatly increases the difficulty of hon. Members who intend to oppose the present Bill; because they have no longer to indulge in the very vague objections which are made to any reform at all; but they have to show why the difficulties which have been met in the Metropolis should not also be dealt with in the country. The Committee reported in July, 1878. The House is disposed to pay great respect to the opinion of a Committee; but in the present case I think it right to point out that the Committee was very nearly divided, and the Report was only carried by the casting vote of the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department (Sir Matthew White Ridley), who occupied the chair. It appears to me to be a very inadequate document; for, after admitting that a very considerable grievance had been established to the satisfaction of the Committee, it went on to say that the question did not press for immediate solution, and might stand over to the time for the renewal of the Ballot Act. I confess I think I can see another reason in the concluding paragraph of the Report, which speaks of the desirability of awaiting the experience of the extended hours in the Metropolis. Yes; there was also this reason—that there may also be a General Election, and a large number of working-class voters may be disfranchised by the existing state of the law. I think the House has reason to complain of the character of the inquiry of the Committee. Out of 23 witnesses, not one was called as a representative of the small towns. At the same time, the Committee issued a Circular to the Mayors of many of the principal towns. They appear to have received only 28 replies, seven being in favour of an alteration, and the other 21 opposed to it. I think it is a great pity that the Committee did not have before them some of those Mayors who objected, in order that they might have been examined and cross-examined as to the grounds of their objection, which I believe would have been found to be of the slightest and scantiest description. I am quite convinced that if those gentlemen had been examined, it would have been found that their objections were really based chiefly on the convenience of the officials, and that there was not sufficient grounds for those anticipated disturbances to which their letters alluded. Of the official witnesses examined, three were chief constables, one of whom, the Chief Constable for Glasgow, had experience of a rough population; and not only was this gentleman in favour of the extension, but he did not anticipate any disturbances in his own city. The last witness examined was the Town Clerk of Manchester. I am personally acquainted with Sir Joseph Heron, the Town Clerk of Manchester, and I must say that he is, to my mind, the type and pattern of municipal officialism. Anyone who reads the evidence given by him to the Committee will find that he did not venture to put any fear of disturbance as a reason against the extension, but the inconvenience to the officials, and the great expense. It seems to me these are not reasons which would justify the House in continuing a system which practically disfranchises a large portion of the community. Nevertheless, the evidence taken by the Committee established very important facts; and I will read one or two short extracts from that evidence. For instance, Mr. Duncan Kennedy, Secretary of the Glasgow Trades Council, said that a large proportion of the working men were almost disfranchised by the present limited hours. Mr. Turner, the Secretary of the Sheffield Trades Council, considered that the number of working men prevented from voting was 5,000. The same gentleman stated that, at the first School Board election in that town, the number of votes polled was 13,000; but in 1873, when the hours were extended, the number amounted to 25,000. Mr. Fitzpatrick, Chairman of the Birkenhead Ship Trades Council, said that 30 of the trades had resolved in favour of extending the hours to 8 o'clock, and he added that one half of the number could not vote under existing circumstances without sacrificing time and wages. The Secretary of the Manchester Trades Council gave evidence to the same effect. Sir Joseph Heron said he did not believe that any practical inconvenience was sustained by existing arrangements, nor had he ever heard any complaints upon the subject. Well, the moment that evidence was reported in Manchester, the Trades Council offered to give evidence before the Committee, and to show that half as many more persons would have voted had the hours been extended, and also that numerous complaints had been made. Mr. Peter Bull, of Manchester, said he believed that 12,000 more voters would have polled at the last Election, had they been furnished with the opportunity. Now, evidence of that kind established two things—first, that a very large number of persons are prevented from giving their votes at present; and, secondly, that many of those who now go to the poll lose time and money. Since I have come into the House I have received a telegram from the proprietor of The Leicester Mercury, who says that at the last Election he saw 60 persons leave without being able to record their votes; and he adds that he knows of another gentleman who saw 80 more in a similar position. The Secretary to the Trades Council, he says, told him that it was painful to see so large a number of persons unable to record their votes. Sir Joseph Heron rather cavalierly observed that he should have thought that if the working classes took a real intelligent interest in the government of their country, they might be expected to make a sacrifice for once in a certain number of years. All I can say is that, if that sacrifice is to be expected, it should not be confined to the one class of the community. I venture to say, if the House thought it desirable to test the interest of the electors in the government of the country by the sacrifice of a day's profits, that the number of persons polling would be very much reduced, and that the reduction would not be larger among the poorer classes than amongst the richer. It could not have been the intention of the Legislature, nor of the Conservative Party, to whom the present arrangements are due, to interpose obstacles to the free exercise of the franchise. It could not have meant to take away with one hand what it gave with the other. It seems to me very hard if English statesmanship is unable to find a remedy for the grievance. With respect to the large towns, there is only one further observation which I should wish to make, and I will take the number of persons who polled at the last General Election in the six principal towns—Manchester, Liverpool, Leeds, Dublin, Birmingham, and Glasgow. The number of votes polled was altogether 183,634, while the constituency of these towns was 276,491. Therefore, only two-thirds of the constituencies, on the average, polled in those great towns. As regards the larger boroughs, the case appears to me to be complete. All I ask the House to do, by passing the second reading of this Bill, is to affirm this principle—that there should be no unnecessary obstacles interposed to the exercise of the franchise. As regards the smaller places, I admit the necessity may be much less. I find that the hon. Member for Clitheroe (Mr. Assheton) has given Notice to move the rejection of the Bill. There is one objection he will, no doubt, offer—namely, that his own borough does not need the change proposed by the Bill. Well, I find that in Clitheroe, at the last Election, the number of electors was 1,700; and of those 896 gave their votes to the hon. Gentleman, and 804 to his opponent; so that, unless some of the electors voted impartially for Liberal and Conservative too, or unless the voters in Clitheroe are like the Americans, who vote "early and often," it is clear that the whole constituency was polled out; and the hon. Gentleman may assert that, so far as Clitheroe is concerned, no case has been made out for an extension of hours. I have, however, to-day presented two Petitions from Clitheroe in favour of the Bill, and I believe the hon. Gentleman will himself present another from his own constituents. I take it, the feeling of the constituency of Clitheroe, as well as other small places, is that, although now there are a good many who vote, they vote at a considerable sacrifice. That is the point to which the hon. Gentleman should direct his observations. It must be evident that those men who work in buildings at some little distance from the place in which they live must find it very difficult, unless they take a holiday and sacrifice a day's wages, to come to the poll. That is the case in places where there is a large number of miners. Some interesting evidence on this matter was given to the Committee. Mr. John Hughes, of Coalbrookdale, told the Committee there were but few voters who did not poll at the last Election; but some of those who voted had to lose their time, which to them was money, and that is the hardship which they complained of. No doubt, at the last General Election, the contest at Morpeth excited a good deal of local interest, and the miners made many sacrifices in order to secure the services of their present Member. Mr. Glassey, in reply to the Committee, said he did not think that many were prevented from voting; but they had to take a general holiday, and lose wages in order to poll. Mr. Bryson, Secretary of the Northumberland Miners' Union, gave similar evidence, and said he calculated that the actual loss of wages to the miners, excluding collateral losses, on the day of the General Election, amounted to £1,000. Under these circumstances, it seems to be simpler and better that the Bill should apply to all constituencies. I find it very difficult to see what harm will result from its application, although in many cases I can see a great deal of good. It is used as an argument against the measure that if the hours are extended it will lead to increased drunkenness; but I venture to suggest that you should allow this Bill to go into Committee, and then, if this is found to be the case, an additional clause might be inserted closing public-houses altogether on the day of Election. By such means you would secure all the advantages I desire to obtain, and, at the same time, most materially lessen in every constituency both the intemperance and the very gross form of bribery which now prevails to a very serious extent. I have now to consider very briefly the objections which have been taken to this proposal. They appear to be two, and two only. The first—and, of course, the most serious one—is the fear that if the hours were greatly extended rioting or disturbance would result. Now, I am bound to say that the evidence on this subject is entirely conflicting. You have, on the one hand, the Chief Constable of Glasgow expressing no fear whatever of disturbance; you have the Mayor of Birmingham stating a similar thing in reply to a question addressed to him; you have the Mayor of Sunderland declaring that at the last School Board election in January, when the hours of polling were from 12 to 7, no disturbance took place, and he is strongly in favour of an extension. The Provost of Perth is of opinion that the extension of the hours of polling would lead to no bad effect; because, in his opinion, the greatest excitement occurs during the hour preceding the declaration of the poll. The Lord Provost of Edinburgh is of opinion that, without danger to the peace of the city, there might be an extension of the hours of polling. Those Mayors who take opposite views do not give any ground for their opinion; and, in many cases, their opinion amounts to the vaguest possible anticipation. In my opinion, rioting is almost a thing of the past; that since the establishment of the Ballot disturbances have become less frequent, and shortly will die out altogether. In my opinion, the present system is more conducive to rioting than anything that can be substituted. Mr. Jackson, the Chief Constable of Sheffield, was asked—

Mr. Chamberlain

Mr. Chamberlain

“Do you think that if the Parliamentary Election should fall in the winter, and if the hours were from 8 o'clock in the morning till 8 o'clock in the evening, and the poll were declared the next day, there would be any danger at all to the peace in your borough?”

and in answer he said—

“I am not so sure about that; but I think there would be many inconveniences in keeping the poll open in the dark.”

Mr. Henderson, the Chief Constable of Leeds, was asked—

“From your past experience, would you have any reason to fear that any disturbance would take place which would lead to jeopardizing the safety of the ballot-boxes?”

and he replied—

“I can only repeat my last answer—that up to the present time I have seen no reason to think that any such danger would arise; but in the event of any great excitement, I can see that the difficulty of conveying the ballot-boxes through such districts as we have in Leeds would be very great indeed.”

Again, Mr. Henderson was asked—

“But you have never seen such a state of excitement as to lead you to suppose that they were in danger?” “No; certainly not.”—“And you have no reason to apprehend anything of the kind from extending the hours of voting?” “Not up to the present time.”

At the last General Election in Sheffield, when I contested the borough with the present junior Member, there was, undoubtedly, very considerable excitement, and great crowds assembled in the street; but the Chief Constable says there was no rioting, only a little horse-play. The playfulness of the people consisted in throwing at my Friend and myself brick-bats and old brushes—and, what was worse than all, a dead cat. Still, I believe, with the Chief Constable, that there was nothing like serious disturbance. What was the state of the case? The poll was continued until 4 o'clock in the afternoon, the declaration of the poll was made at midnight, and during the whole of that time the town was in a state of considerable excitement. That, in itself, is likely to bring about disturbance; because, under the present arrangement, you have the most exciting event of the whole election—the declaration of the poll—made known just in the small hours of the night. If the present Bill is passed, it will necessitate the postponement of the declaration of the poll until the next day, when it might be made about 10 o'clock in the morning, and it would be made, I have no doubt, in perfect quiet. We may speak with some certainty about this matter of disturbance, because we have considerable experience concerning it. Evidence was given to the Committee by Mr. Hagger, Vestry Clerk in Liverpool, who said that the last vestry poll was kept open until 8 o'clock at night; and, in his opinion, the result of that was that the number of persons who voted doubled those who voted at any previous election. Then, again, we have still more important experience—that of the London School Board. The last was a very exciting election, which largely interested the working classes, and a very much larger number of persons polled at that election than polled at the previous Parliamentary Election. The poll was taken on a November day, in a London fog, and in gas-light; and, in spite of all these circumstances, there was not the slightest disturbance, or even apprehension of disturbance. I cannot see, under these circumstances, how the objection, which is taken by some of the official representatives, can have the slightest foundation. The second objection is, that any alteration of the law of the kind proposed would increase the expense. Sir Joseph Heron thinks that if the hours of polling are extended, it would be necessary to employ relays of polling clerks. Again, I may appeal to the experience of the London School Board election. It has not been found necessary in London to employ relays of clerks, and to use this objection appears perfectly ridiculous. There is no merchant's or business man's office in which the clerks do not occasionally—for instance, when making up the books—attend for a period of at least 10 hours; and I am sure there would be no difficulty in finding plenty of persons willing to undertake the work under the altered conditions. Neither do I think it would be necessary to increase the remuneration; for, at the present time, the payment to the polling clerks is not exactly proportioned to the amount of work performed. From my own experience, I am confident that it would be perfectly possible to obtain a sufficient number of clerks even if the hours were extended until 8 o'clock at night. I believe, however, that if the proposed extension of hours takes place, there will be a corresponding reduction in many items of expense. Under the present system there is an unnecessary multiplication of the number of polling stations. In Birmingham we have no less than 180 polling stations, and the Returning Officers' expenses amount to £1,500. Notwithstanding that we have so many stations, we find that at the dinner-hour our polling accommodation is not sufficient; but if the hours were extended, there is no doubt it would be possible to very materially reduce the number of polling stations, and, consequently, reduce the expense. These are the only objections I have been able to find against the present measure, and I think they disappear in the face of the evidence before us. In conclusion, I venture to hope that, although the Under Secretary appeared to oppose any alteration in Committee, I may, nevertheless, have the support of the Government on the present occasion. The Chancellor of the Exchequer stated, when this subject was last discussed, that he had no objection whatever to the principle of the measure. Under these circumstances, I may claim his support for the second reading of this Bill; and, as I have previously stated, the promoters will be willing to accept any Amendment the Government might make with the view of meeting the circumstances of small boroughs. I hope we may all assist to remedy the present evil, and that we may be enabled to remove the existing restrictions, which are not only undesirable in themselves, but especially undesirable in this—that they affect one class only of the community, that class being the largest. I move the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the Bill be now read a second time.”—(Mr. Chamberlain.)

MR. ASSHETON, in moving the Amendment of which he had given Notice—that the Bill be read a second time that day three months—said, that as regarded small boroughs the hon. Member, as it seemed to him, did not intend to press his Bill. He would thank the hon. Member for the reference which he had made to Clitheroe. No doubt, the electors were well polled at the last Election. He had been reminded that there was a Petition from that borough in favour of the Bill. He had obtained possession of it, and would present it in the course of the afternoon. Referring to the heading of it, he found that the words, “the inhabitants of the borough,” had been struck out, and the words, “members of the Liberal Club,” had been inserted in their stead. He did not know whether the Committee on Petitions would receive the Petition. It was obvious that the attempt to get up the Petition of the people of Clitheroe had failed, and that the promoters had been obliged, in the last resort, to go down to the Liberal Club to get the necessary signatures. On looking at the back of the Bill itself, he found it was specially patronized by some of the most eminent rising Liberals of that House. He did not say that it was a revolutionary measure; but, on the contrary, he condemned it as a re-actionary measure, tending to revive some of the worst usages of the dark ages by lengthening the hours of polling. Such a Bill was fraught with the most dangerous consequences, and was quite uncalled for by the circumstances of the present time. Members opposite appeared to regard this as a Party measure; but, so far as it could be regarded as a measure to facilitate the recording of votes, it was not Liberal, any more than it was Conservative in its object, the Conservative Members being as much dependent for their seats on the votes of the working classes as were the Liberal Members. In the old days, there was no limit whatever to the time at which the poll should be kept open, though he supposed it was allowed to close at some time or other; but in 1785 an Act was passed—25 Geo. III., c. 84—providing that—

Mr. Chamberlain

“Every poll should be duly proceeded in from day to day, Sundays excepted, until it shall be finished, but so that no poll shall continue open more than 15 days at most;”

but that period was, by the Act 9 Geo. IV. cut down to nine days, and by 2 Will. IV. to two days. Since that time other changes had been made, limiting the period to one day, and fixing the hours in England, in boroughs from 8 A.M. to 4 P.M., and in counties from 8 A.M. to 5 P.M., and he believed the were similar in Scotland and Ireland. The promoters of this Bill now proposed to extend those hours from 8 A.M. to 8 P.M. The constant tendency of modern legislation in these days of expeditious travelling had been to shorten the hours of polling; and although this Bill would only give four additional hours for that process, still it sought to insert the thin end of the wedge, and it went in a retrograde direction—at which he was a little surprised, considering the quarter in which it originated. In 1877 the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) brought forward a proposal to make the hours of polling in the Metropolis from 8 to 8. A Committee was afterwards appointed to inquire into the subject, and it recommended that those should be the hours adopted for the Metropolis. An Act was passed in 1878 giving effect to that recommendation; but there had not been an election in any one of the Metropolitan boroughs since then, so they could not look for any assistance from the experience of these boroughs in determining what line ought to be pursued at the present moment; but, however, they might hope to receive some little help from the experience of the School Boards. Twenty only out of 71 School Boards had tried hours of polling different from the normal ones of 9 to 4; but very few had tried as late as 8 o'clock. Brighton had tried later hours than 9 to 4, but never kept the poll open until 8 o'clock, and had since returned to the old hours of from 9 to 4; and Salford tried from 12 to 7 in 1873, but there had been no contest since. In point of fact, there had been little experience in keeping polls open until a late hour beyond that afforded by School Board elections in the Metropolis. As appears by the Appendix of the Report of the Committee of 1877, the Town Clerk of Salford said that the arrangement by which the poll was kept open until 7 o'clock was found to work admirably, inasmuch as it afforded a better opportunity for the working classes to record their votes. Leeds had tried from 1 to 8, but had returned to 9 to 4. The Town Clerk of Birmingham said that from 9 o'clock to 4 o'clock had been found the most convenient hours for polling; and he also said—

“It has been represented that hours in the evening would be a convenience to working men; but the elections are held in the short days of the year, and it is important that the poll should take place during the hours of daylight.”

That opinion he (Mr. Assheton) commended to the hon. Member for Birmingham. Another Committee of the House of Commons sat in 1878 to consider the whole question, and the concluding paragraphs of the Report of that Committee were conclusive against this Bill; and they suggested that as the question did not press for an immediate solution it should stand over until the time—not very far distant—arrived for considering whether the Ballot Act should be continued. The hon. Member for Birmingham was prepared to confine his Bill to the large boroughs, and altogether to abandon the small boroughs.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN explained, that he did not abandon the small boroughs, but left himself as to them in the hands of the House.

MR. ASSHETON said, it was not very easy to draw a hard-and-fast line in such a matter between the large and the small boroughs; but, in his opinion, the evils of keeping the poll open till 8 at night would be much greater in the small than in the large boroughs. He could not understand why the working men of this country were to be put to no inconvenience or pecuniary loss by attending to vote. There was no Member of that House that was not put to some inconvenience by attending to his duties; and Mr. Speaker was obliged to take a hasty dinner on four days every week for six months, in order to allow him to attend to his political duties. What were the reasons advanced for the Bill? The main reason was that working men and business men had, under the present system, some difficulty in recording their votes. Hon. Members on this and the other side of the House approached the question, in one substantial particular, from a very different point of view. He looked upon the franchise as a trust, while many Gentlemen opposite looked upon it as a right. Looking upon it as a trust, he naturally wished that those who were likely to discharge the trust to the benefit of the community at large should have full opportunity of doing so; but if there were any who were really unfit to have the trust reposed in them, then it was no very great hardship that they should be excluded. If people were not prepared to make some sacrifice to exercise the franchise, they could well be done without; and to pass this Bill would, in a great measure, meet the circumstances of that class of persons who, politically speaking, were most idle and most vacillating and venal. In a former speech, the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea pointed out that the hours of polling in boroughs and counties were not the same; that in England and Ireland, also, they were not the same; and that the reason for those variations was that the circumstances of various localities greatly differed. Nevertheless, the hon. Baronet had put his name on the back of the present Bill, which went in for a dull, uniform system, wholly irrespective of the varying circumstances of different places. It was easy to get up Petitions, either for or against a particular measure. In the course of his communication with an Association who were opposed to this Bill, he had inquired whether they had any Petition against it, and was told that they would get up one if he liked, on which he said that he was not sure whether it was necessary, but that he would let them know. He did not think that it was necessary to present a Petition against the Bill, and, therefore, he did not let them know. This was the reason why he was not in a position, like the hon. Member opposite, to present a bundle of Petitions on the subject to the House; and he could only express his regret if, owing to an error of judgment, he had weakened the case of the hon. Members who thought with him by not letting the different associations who were opposed to the Bill "know." A general reason against the Bill was that there was not the least doubt that the proposed extension would give increased facilities for bribery, treating, and personation; and he felt sure that the more hours there were for polling the more time there would be for bribery and treating, and, consequently, the more it would be likely to take place; besides which, the fact that the hours would be extended into the dark hours of the night rendered bribery and the other abuses of treating and personation considerably easier than in the light of day. If the Bill before the House was passed into law, he believed about 85 per cent of the Elections which took place would be closed in the dark; but whether they were closed in the dark or in the light, one thing was certain—namely, that the adding up of the votes could not be finished in time for the declaration of the poll on the same night, and thus another day would be broken into. The poll would then have to be declared on the next day, and that meant the additional expense of Returning Officers, clerks, &c., for another day; and he contended that the more they increased the expenses of Elections the more the House of Commons would be what hon. Members opposite said it should not be, and the less likely would it be to have other than wealthy Members returned to it. For those reasons, which he considered very important ones, he moved the rejection of the Bill.

Mr. Assheton

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(M^r. Assheton.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE observed, that the hon. Member who had just sat down had made a long and elaborate, and a somewhat humorous speech against the Bill; but had failed to demolish, or even seriously to touch, the very sound arguments of the hon. Member for Birmingham in its favour. The hon. Member opposite had complained that the Liberal Members were treating this subject as a Party question; but were not the Conservative Members open to a similar charge? The question had not been made a Party one in that House in the last Parliament; while, in the House of Lords, the Conservative Party had actually carried an Amendment upon which the present Bill was founded. Owing to the manner in which the Conservative Party were now treating the question, he was afraid that it must now become a Party one; but that would not be the fault of the Liberal Members. The Committee which sat last year to consider this subject had been composed of an equal number of Conservative and of Liberal Members, the casting vote being given by the Chairman in favour of the Conservative view. It was a remarkable fact that, although the Committee were agreed that a grievance on this question existed, and ought to be remedied, the voting in all divisions was conducted on strictly Party principles. The Conservative Party had not opposed the extension of the hours of polling in the Metropolis; and it lay upon them to show why the same principle that applied to the Metropolis should not apply equally to the large Provincial boroughs. There were a large number of towns in the country in which the grievance was almost as great as it was in London, and in which it could be as easily remedied. The opinion of Sir Joseph Heron, which had been quoted, only represented the view of the Town Clerk of Manchester, who, having become accustomed to one system, did not wish to be bothered with another likely to make him put off his dinner one day in the year to a later hour than usual. But the inconvenience of a Town Clerk was a small matter in comparison with the disadvantage at present suffered by a vast mass of the population by the hours of polling. Artizans disliked being obliged to ask the favour of a holiday from an employer, who was likely to be of opposite politics to themselves, in order that they might record their votes, and in many trades if one or two machinememen were allowed to leave business must come to a stop for the whole day. There was nothing to compel Manchester and Salford, or Newcastle and Gateshead, to have the polling on the same day. Very often in those places the polling was on different days; and some men working in one borough would have to vote in another, as they did not belong to the same constituency as their employers. In such cases, they could not benefit by those general holidays which were granted at Elections in some towns, and which rendered this grievance less in some parts of Lancashire than elsewhere. It was a "dog in the manger" policy for Lancashire Members to resist the Bill; but he was sure the Conservative Members for Liverpool would not oppose it, for in that town both political Parties were agreed as to the necessity of extended hours. With regard to the Report of the Select Committee, the Chairman's draft Report was lost by a single vote, one of the Conservative phalanx not having arrived, and the draft of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) was carried as the basis of the Report. But, then, the missing Conservative turned up; and, thereafter, the proceedings were entirely changed, every paragraph in that draft Report being either rejected or mangled by the Chairman's casting vote, and the result was the curious patchwork which had been presented. It was thus the Conservatives, and not the Liberals, who had dealt with this subject on strict Party lines. The hon. Member opposite had brought forward the old argument that the franchise was a trust, whereas the Liberals regarded it as a right; but whether a trust or a right, every man who possessed it should be placed in a position to exercise it. The hon. Member said that as many obstacles as possible should be in the way of idle men recording their votes; but the effect of the present law was not to prevent the idle, but the industrious, men from voting. There was nothing to prevent the pot-house loafer from voting; while the man who was in steady employment might have considerable difficulty in doing so. He thought it could not be desirable that they should fine one or two classes a day's wages to enable them to exercise the franchise, unless there were some stronger reason for closing the poll at 4 o'clock than at present appeared. With regard to bribery, treating, and personation, it was a delicate subject to refer to; but he was afraid, from the fact that at the last Election at Clitheroe—which the hon. Member (Mr. Assheton) represented—the poll represented the full number of electors on the roll, that the dead men must have polled. He did not believe there was any very considerable or organized personation in existence at the present time, and gaslight would be quite as effectual a preventive of personation as daylight. The last General Election in London took place on a foggy day, and was conducted entirely by gaslight. The hon. Member had not laid much stress on bribery and treating; but he had expressed the fear that rioting would take place. Sir Edmund Henderson, the Chief of the Police in the Metropolis, had expressed the opinion that an extension of hours would not lead to rioting; and the fact was, that the risk of rioting at Elections had been decreased enormously since the passing of the Ballot Act. There had been only one riot at an Election since that Act had been in force, and that was at Great Grimsby; but it had nothing to do with the hour of closing, and, in fact, took place the next day on the declaration of the poll. As to his last argument, that there would be an increase of expense, it was true that the evidence before the Committee went to show that there would be a small increase of expense. In London, however, their experience was that there would be no increase of expense at all. The fact was that at Elections they did not pay in proportion to the length of work; but trustworthy men were obtained, and they were paid for the work as a whole. It might, however, be desirable, if this Bill were passed, to delay the counting of the papers till the day after the poll. His

hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham had gone into the question so completely, that he did not think it necessary to detain the House with any further observations.

MR. HALSEY admitted that it would be unfair, having given the franchise, to attempt to restrict it by limiting the hours of polling. If it were desired to restrict the hours of voting, that ought to be done in a straightforward manner by bringing in a Bill on the subject. Nor did he think it possible for anyone who had heard or read the evidence given before the Committee to deny that, in certain instances, a case had been made out for the extension of the polling hours. For instance, people engaged in mines went down before the poll was opened, and did not get up till after it was closed. It was found, also, that engineers and persons in charge of engines could not leave their work without putting a whole establishment out of gear. But, while admitting that, he was not prepared to admit also that this was a time when, in view of other circumstances, they should make an alteration of such a sweeping character as was proposed in the Bill. The hon. Member for Birmingham, to a certain extent, recognized that objection, because there were three modifications to which he was willing to consent. One was, that there should be attached to the Bill a Schedule containing the names of certain boroughs to which the Bill should not apply; another was, that some limit of population should be established; and the third was, that there should be a certain amount of local discretion. But it was hardly fair to throw such a sweeping Bill upon the Table of the House and leave it to hon. Members to make changes which would entirely alter its character. The main reason, however, why he opposed the Bill he could not give in better language than was contained in the last paragraph of the Report of the Committee—it was to the effect that this question did not press for any immediate solution, and that, in the absence of urgent necessity, it might best stand over for the time, not now far distant, when the Ballot Act would have to be reconsidered.

MR. RATHBONE: I do hope that the House will see its way to passing this Bill. It is one of considerable importance to the respectable working man who wishes to give his vote without either leaving his work or being taken to the poll by a practical breach of the law against the employment of conveyances by the candidate or his friends. It is important, therefore, on two grounds that we should not seem, on the one hand, to have given the working man his vote, and, on the other hand, to have thrown difficulties in the way of his exercising it; and it is very important, also, on the ground that Parliament should never pass laws with the certainty that they will not be obeyed. I think I can give the House some valuable experience on this subject, showing, first, that the danger which has been put forward against allowing voting, possibly in the dark hours, is purely chimerical; and, secondly, showing what an immense convenience it would be to the working man to be able to vote, on returning from his work, in the neighbourhood of his own house. Our experience in Liverpool is the more important and conclusive because, no doubt, the House is aware that we have in Liverpool considerable difficulties from the existence among our working population of considerable antagonism of both national and religious feeling, owing to our having in the town a large number of Irish Catholics, and also a very large number of Orangemen and others with strong Protestant feelings; and I am also afraid that there is a certain amount of jealousy of the Irish population of the town. In 1874, at our Easter election for Select Vestrymen—that is, the Guardians of the poor—we had a very strong contest, which lasted for the extraordinary term of 26 days, during which these feelings of antagonism were strongly excited. The Vestry determined to try the experiment of different hours of polling—from 10 to 4 on some days, from 2 to 8 on others, and from 3 and 4 to 9 on other days, feeling satisfied that there was no real risk of disturbance even in a period of excitement. Now, it will be evident, from the season of the year, that from 6 to 9 at night it was dark; but there was no disturbance, and the average number of persons voting at different hours strikingly shows how valuable to the working man is the power of voting after his work is done. The average number of persons voting per hour between 10 and 2 was only 52;

Sir Charles W. Dilke

whereas from 6 to 7 an average of 112 persons voted; from 7 to 8 an average of 184 persons voted; and from 8 to 9 an average of 169 persons voted; and of the latter, from the number of votes given by each person voting, it was evident that the vast majority were working men. Now, this shows two things—first, that even where considerable excitement, both religious and political, exists, the working man may be safely trusted to go to the poll without disturbance; and, secondly, the great advantage it is to the working man to have this facility given to him. I shall be happy to show to anyone the analysis of the figures to which I have referred. They show conclusively that for all classes of the community the later hours, say from 10, or 11, or 12 to 8 or 9, would cover the hours most convenient for polling, where voters have their choice. I would further point out that where the poll is kept open to a late hour, it will be impossible for the numbers to be known until the next day; and this would prevent the assemblage of large crowds late at night to hear the result of the poll, and the excitement which might result from disappointment. Then, as to the compulsory violation of the law under the present system. The law makes the employment of cabs by candidates, or those acting on their behalf, illegal. Yet, in large towns, this law is habitually evaded, if not violated; and it is impossible to prevent it, for it is easy for friends of a candidate to avoid becoming members of his committee, or otherwise agents of the candidate, and to make their contribution to the expenses of the election by providing cabs for the conveyance of voters to the poll. By the adoption of different hours of polling the employment of cabs would be rendered absolutely unnecessary, for working men could vote close to their own homes after they had returned from their work; and I am satisfied that, for the reasons I have given, the danger of disturbance would not only not be increased, but would be diminished by such a system. I am aware that a difficulty has been alleged against our proposal, in that the hours of polling would be so long as to necessitate a double set of polling-clerks, deputy Returning Officers, &c.; but this would easily be met by commencing to vote at a later hour, say 10 or 12 o'clock. There is, there no practical reason against the proposal we now make; while its advantages, both to the working man, and in facilitating the due observance of the law, would be very great indeed.

MR. WHEELHOUSE said, he regretted as much as anybody in the world that there was no Conservative Member's name on the back of this Bill. This matter ought not to be considered as a Party question; and he did not think that until this Bill was, unfortunately, published without a single Conservative Member's name upon the back of it, the question partook of Party politics in any way whatever. But even if this was a Party matter, that was by no means an answer to the question as to whether it was right or whether it was wrong any longer to deprive a large portion of the greatest class of this country of the franchise, which was undoubtedly given to them. He was not then going to enter into the question whether the power of voting was a right or a trust, though he himself entertained very strong views on that subject; but he might say that he hoped it partook in a large measure of both. But when the franchise had been given—and whether as a right or a trust he cared not—and it came to be exercised, he was one of those who thought they were bound, as a branch of the Legislature, to do everything they could to enable that right or trust to be employed. This extension of polling time had been already granted to the Metropolis, and he was glad it had been so granted; but when he was told that the Metropolitan boroughs were the largest boroughs in the country, he was simply told that which he could place no reliance on as a fact. Why, half the boroughs of the Metropolis were mere children to the borough he represented, and as grand-children when compared with the borough represented by the hon. Member who spoke last (Mr. Rathbone). In the Metropolitan boroughs, some 6,000 or 8,000 electors on each side determined the whole thing. His own borough was not one of the largest; but taking that, and such boroughs as Glasgow, Liverpool, or even Birmingham, surely if it was right and reasonable to grant longer hours for polling to the Metropolitan boroughs with their 14,000 or 15,000 electors—surely there could be no reason on earth why in those large boroughs such as he had mentioned the long polling hours should not also be granted. Besides, it applied with tenfold more force to a borough like Leeds than to any Metropolitan one, for there a large proportion of the constituency was made up of the wage-earning class. They were deeply interested in what went on in the House, and in the discussion of every question which affected them. No class was more alive to the importance of questions of the incidence of taxation, both Imperial and local, than was the wage-earning class of a large manufacturing borough. When he was told that it was right and reasonable to give the franchise to the working men of Marylebone, and practically to deny it to the working class of a town like Leeds, why the statement was so palpably founded on error that it carried with it its own refutation. Gentlemen who opposed this measure seemed to forget that they had not now the excitement of the nomination day. The abolition of that was one of the few good things the Ballot gave them; it undoubtedly was a great gain to get rid of all the turmoil consequent upon nominations, and in some measure had, in many large towns, got rid of the tumult arising out of declarations, and hereafter he trusted it would be got rid of altogether. Having swept those evils aside, what was there to fear in this extension? If a man wanted to personate, or to bribe, or to make any member of his constituency amenable to the law punishing corrupt practices at elections, why, he could do it now in any dark corner away from the light of day. But to tell him, with his 40 years' experience, that there was, practically, the slightest chance of increasing facilities for bribery and corruption, or in any way conducing to the demoralization of a constituency by this extension of polling time, was to say that which he no more regarded than the idle wind. Leeds—and he spoke of the borough with respect and pleasure—set a foremost example for many years past of how Parliamentary Elections could be conducted absolutely free from the intimidation, bribery, and corruption, of which so much was heard in the House, but of which, considering our enormous population, so little was found from end to end of the country. But even granting that the larger boroughs were more subject to these influences than they were, or were ever likely to be, that was no reason why the wage-earning class should be altogether deprived of the franchise which had been given them, and which, under every possible circumstance, they desired to exercise. Was it reasonable, was it right, was it just, that a man engaged, say, in driving a railway engine, should be deprived of the power of registering his vote at some hour when he was free from his daily occupation? Was it right that a man working in a mine, and who could not leave his work until the cage was lowered for him, should be prevented from voting? If the hours were extended, then this man could record his vote whether engaged upon the day shift or the night shift, and with this advantage—that he would be free from any influence on the part of his master. No door would be closed upon him; there would be no block in his way—no fear of what was called the “sack,” to prevent the exercise of the power the Ballot gave him. The arguments in favour of the Bill in regard to large boroughs—and, certainly, as regarded his own constituency—were unanswerable, and he gave the Bill his cordial support even to the length to which it went. If the principle of the Bill were accepted, then if a distinction was drawn between larger and smaller boroughs—and in some of the latter it might not be desirable to extend the polling time—then, if that should be found to be the case, it was a matter for settling in Committee, and was nothing against the principle as the House had it proposed to them. It had been said that someone had recommended the House should wait for some length of time—and the waiting in that House had become an indefinite prolongation—to watch the operation of the Metropolitan Law. But why should they wait? If Parliament had declared by enactment that this change was good for Chelsea, or for Marylebone, or the Tower Hamlets, why should Leeds, with similar circumstances, wait? Or why should Bradford be called on to wait? If the measure was good for the first-mentioned borough, then it was good for the others; and he could not understand why the large boroughs of Yorkshire should be called upon to wait and waive their claim for a time until some dilatory spirits had convinced themselves they had done right in London, and that their legislation was such as they could rely on. That was an argument eminently uncharacteristic of this Assembly. Either the House had done wrong—in which case the Act should be repealed—or else let what had been done for the Metropolitan boroughs be extended to boroughs far larger than any in the Metropolis. Surely, if it was a mistake to pass the late Statute, that should have been discovered before the measure became law; and when it was found that the only reason for saying the large boroughs must wait until it could be said the Act worked well in smaller boroughs, it was asking him to accept a principle he could not view with any favour. With regard to the measure itself, he could only say that supposing any alterations or addition to the hours of polling were to be made, those alterations should be made with reference to the requirements and position of the borough, rather than to mere population; the circumstances of each case should be decided on its own merits, and not according to that rough-and-ready method of dealing with mere arithmetical numbers, which often did much damage. If distinctions were made, and any separation and classification of boroughs proposed, then all the circumstances of each should be taken into account before coming to a determination. Another observation he wished to make in regard to what had been said was, that a great many boroughs violated the law by the use of cabs at Elections. He did not know that this violation of the law was general, and he was quite prepared to deny that every borough did so, and that from his own knowledge. He wished there was less use of hired cabs; but, still, there were circumstances applicable to some boroughs which rendered their use absolutely necessary. For example, Leeds extended for $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles in one direction, and $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles in another; and in such a borough it was almost impossible, under existing regulations, that every man wishing to register his vote could find the opportunity of doing so. He mentioned this, because he could not help thinking it desirable, in dealing with any re-arrangement of polls or polling places, an increase should be made in the number of polling places, or else in the large boroughs the same right should be allowed as existed in the counties and in Wenlock and Shoreham. In saying that, he wished to emphasize in the strongest manner his desire to see every man who was in possession of the franchise have the means of exercising it. He hoped those mythical anticipations—that length of polling time would lead to corruption, bribery, and intimidation—would be swept away; and, so far as the large boroughs were concerned, he was anxious that wherever the franchise had been given to the working classes there should be every opportunity for the full use of it.

Mr. Rathbone

DR. CAMERON said, there were a number of hon. Members who wished to address the House; and, therefore, he should make his remarks very brief, but should not like the discussion to pass without taking some part in it, because it was a matter in which his constituents were very much interested, and because he had had the honour of serving on the two Committees which sat upon this subject, and, as far as the debate had gone, he was the only Member who had served on the two. Up to that point they had only had one speech directly against the Bill, because the hon. Member's (Mr. Halsey's) speech was not against the principle of the measure; he objected only to the manner and the time in which it was brought forward, and in saying that he thought he was supporting the Report of the Committee, in favour of which he had voted. That was not, however, the part of the Report of the Committee to which they objected. The part of the Report to which they objected was that in which it was declared that it would be undesirable to extend the hours of polling in boroughs, in the absence of any urgent necessity, and in the face of certain difficulties which had been indicated. Now, they did not see that there was anything undesirable in the matter. They did not see that any harm could arise were the hours of polling extended in every borough constituency and even in every county constituency throughout the Kingdom. The hon. Member for Clitheroe (Mr. Assheton) asked very emphatically why that had been made a Party question? Well, he could not understand how it had come to be made a Party question, except through the mismanagement of the Party opposite. Up to last year it was not a Party question. The Committee which sat in 1877 included the majority of Conservative Metropolitan borough Members, and its Chairman was the then President of the Board of Trade (Sir Charles Adderley), and yet that Committee unanimously reported that the case in favour of the extension of the hours in Metropolitan constituencies had been clearly made out. Up to that point there was nothing of a Party character in the matter. But when the Committee was re-appointed in 1878 there was a considerable change made in its personnel. Now, exception has been taken to the limited nature of the inquiry of the Committee. On what account was it that they did not go further into the evidence? that they did not get more witnesses to prove the necessity and desirability of the extension? Why after they had examined a certain number of witnesses representing political and trade organizations of working men in all parts of the country the Committee considered the question of receiving further evidence; and he most distinctly recollected their saying that if those Members who opposed the extension of hours were not satisfied with the amount of evidence that they had brought on the point, they were ready to go on ad infinitum. Those Gentlemen, however, replied—"You can go and get secretaries and representatives of working men, and evidence of that sort ad infinitum, but we do not want a repetition. We have heard all their arguments, let us go on to something else." And it was on that account that they did not go into the question of comparatively smaller boroughs at all length. They did, however, go into the case of one or two of them; and if hon. Members would look at the evidence of the last two witnesses, they would find that they were representatives of small and scattered boroughs. As to the case of Ireland, unfortunately the Member representing the Home Rule Party who was appointed on the Committee chose not to attend on it, and, therefore, there was no one to conduct the case on behalf of Ireland. He did not know that there was any great demand for this reform on the part of Ireland; but if there was not, he could well understand why there should not be—for the simple reason that there was no working class constituency in Ireland. The franchise was totally different in Ireland to that in this country, and, consequently, the grievance might not arise and might not exist. But as to what did occur; had the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department (Sir Matthew White Ridley) taken up the position which had been taken to-day by the hon. Member (Mr. Halsey), and had he said that this was not the time to consider the question of an extension of the franchise—had he simply said that the Ballot Act would expire in another year, and then that the matter could be taken in connection with other matters that would then arise, he did not think his hon. Friend (Mr. Chamberlain) would have had any reason for bringing in his Bill. What had justified him in acting now was the distinct expression of opinion hostile to the principle of extended hours contained in the Report of the Chairman of the Committee of last year. There were one or two points to which he should like to call attention which had not yet been noticed. The convenience of, and the necessity for, an extension of the hours of polling were so evident to unprejudiced persons that when the Education Act came into operation, the hours of polling in the Metropolitan boroughs were fixed by the Privy Council at from 8 to 8, and the official witness who gave evidence upon the point told them distinctly that the reason why the hours were so fixed by the Education Department was because of the obvious necessity for giving facilities to the working class voters, who, unless the hours were so extended, would have no opportunity of recording their votes. As he had said, his constituency had all along shown a great interest in the matter; and he could safely affirm there was no domestic political question on which he had been so repeatedly catechized by them as on that question of the extension of the hours of polling. Last year, when the Committee was sitting, his constituents sent up a Petition signed by 12,000 or 13,000 artizans, each of whom appended his address to his signature, praying for an extension of the hours of polling. Well, they asked what were the arguments against it? The arguments were that there would be a serious increase of expense, and a great risk of disturbance. As to the risk of disturbances, all the evidence given before the Committee of last year on that point was theoretical; and he verily believed that was one reason why the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department, who, he must say, approached the subject in a very fair and impartial manner, and afforded them every facility for bringing up the evidence that they desired—he said that was one of the reasons why he did not adopt the same view as that which was adopted by the Chairman of the Committee in 1877. For before the Committee of 1877 they had practical men, and they one and all laughed at the idea of danger to the peace. It was almost absurd and quite useless to bring up one Town Clerk after another last year, and to repeat a dialogue like this—

Mr. Wheelhouse

“You have had no experience of extended hours of polling?—Not at all. You think it would be attended with considerable risk?—Yes. You think it would not be very desirable?—I am sure of it. You think it would cause additional expense?—Obviously.”

The fact was that those witnesses were naturally averse to incurring any extra trouble; but on the previous Committee they had examined men who had had actual experience of the longer hours, and they had facts and not theories. The consequence was that they had practical and conclusive evidence in favour of such an extension of hours, and the Committee of 1877 reported accordingly. His hon. Friend (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had referred to Colonel Henderson's evidence; and, as it was important on the point of increased danger of rioting, he might be permitted to make a further reference to it. Colonel Henderson was asked whether, in his opinion, the hours of polling at Parliamentary Elections in the Metropolis could be safely extended? and he said—

“He saw no objection to it whatever. Since the passing of the Ballot Act we have never had the slightest trouble at any Election which has taken place in London, and the places that used to be the worst are now the best; so that, from a police point of view, I do not see any objection whatever to extending the hours.”

He was then asked if he had had any experience of rioting? He said—

“Yes, in the Tower Hamlets, which had always been a hot-bed of rioting, but since 1870 had given no trouble whatever.”

Now, experience of that sort was of some value; but to argue that because a number of Town Clerks and Chief Constables of towns, who had had no experience on the subject, contradicted each other, therefore a danger of riot had been proved, was absurd. They did not go into the London experience in the matter, they did not bring up practical evidence before the Committee last year on that subject, because the Report of the Committee of the previous year had been referred to them. It had been referred to them; but he could not say how many Members of the Committee took the trouble to read it. Then, as to the consideration of expense, they had been told that the expense would be increased. The first Committee had approached that question also from a practical standpoint. There had been previously in London three School Board elections, all from 8 to 8. What did they find? He specially examined one witness after another with respect to the comparative expense of the School Board and Parliamentary Elections in the Metropolitan boroughs; and, referring to that evidence, he found some rather remarkable facts. Mr. Ellis, who acted as the Returning Officer for Hackney, told them that the Parliamentary constituency of that borough numbered 44,000, while the School Board constituency numbered 56,000. There were two Members returned to Parliament, and five members to the School Board, and in the case of the School Board's election there was the additional complication of the cumulative voting. The risk of riot in the School Board election, if any, would be, of course, increased from the fact that those elections took place all through the Metropolis on the same day; and yet the School Board elections passed off with perfect quiet, and cost only £800, as against £1,150 for the Parliamentary Election. Again, in Marylebone, they found that four School Board elections had taken place. On the first occasion, 125,000 votes were recorded, and the total of the official expenses was only £669; whilst, on the second occasion, 136,000 votes were recorded, and the official expenses were £735. This showed very clearly that a mere extension of hours need not involve any increased expenditure. If there was, it would be a mere bagatelle. The Sheriff-Clerk of Glasgow, who had gone minutely into the case, said that in that large constituency the increased expenditure would probably amount to about £500. His hon. Friend (Mr. Chamberlain) had referred to the case of Morpeth, where a holiday was necessitated by the short hours of polling, which cost the men £1,000, and the masters probably much more. It was worthy of remark that the men who were in favour of the extension of hours were not so in favour of it on the ground that the extra expense incurred would come out of other men's pockets, because they were all in favour of the official expenses being put upon the rates. An objection which had been raised to the proposal of his hon. Friend was that it was not right to thrust it upon towns which did not want it. To meet that objection, he (Dr. Cameron) submitted to the Committee an alternative Report, recommending that a distinction should be drawn between boroughs of a population of 100,000, and boroughs with less than that number, and that the presumption in the first case should be in favour of the longer hours, and in the second case in favour of the shorter hours, but that every Town Council should have the power to adopt, by special resolution, the short hours in the case of the larger, or the longer hours in the case of the smaller boroughs. He believed that plan would very soon work itself right, and would adjust the hours to the local requirements and the wishes of each constituency. He had very little doubt that few of the larger boroughs would choose the shorter hours; because the support given to the proposal for extension by Conservative Members for large constituencies was significant of the wishes of those whom they represented. He would not enter more fully into the matter, and would only add that he hoped the House would give the Bill a second reading.

Mr. A. GATHORNE-HARDY said, he thought the cautious and careful Report of the Committee of last Session ought to be sanctioned rather than the proposition of the hon. Member for Birmingham. Let the experiment be tried in the Metropolis at the next Election; and, if it succeeded, then the legislation might be extended to the rest of the country. Scant justice had been done to the witnesses who gave evidence to the Committee on this subject, and who pointed out a great many inconveniences which might result, and which ought to be considered before the House rushed into further legislation. No doubt, in the case of large boroughs, it would have been easy to have multiplied witnesses in favour of longer hours; but he did not make the same admission with regard to the smaller boroughs, which did not desire longer hours unless some local peculiarity of trade rendered them necessary. There could not be much necessity in a borough like Wenlock, where 3,121 out of 3,492 voters went to the poll, and the majority of them did so before half-past 2 o'clock. Even the secretaries of trade councils and others who advocated extension admitted that they always managed to record their votes. The passing of the Bill would be inconvenient to smaller boroughs in several respects. Every witness before the Committee admitted that there would be an increase of expense. The officials would have to be paid at a higher rate than at present if the hours of polling were extended. It was easier to bribe and personate in the dark than in the light, and the danger of drunkenness would increase, accompanied with riot and disturbance. Another objection was that the Bill would make voting gregarious, the working men would come up together in large numbers, and there would be enlarged opportunities for intimidation. They could not argue, as the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Rathbone) did, that because one Election had passed off quietly all others would do so. It was the members of trades councils who were not apprehensive of disturbance; but those who were responsible for the maintenance of order did not view the proposal with equanimity. One of the witnesses examined by the Committee was Sir Joseph Heron—[A laugh—who had been 40 years Town Clerk of Manchester. Hon. Gentlemen laughed at Sir Joseph Heron's name—[“No, no!”]—and evidence; but he ventured to say that Sir Joseph Heron's evidence was worth as much as that of many other witnesses who were called, and it was given in no uncertain voice. Sir Joseph Heron said an extension was wholly unnecessary, and that, with one exception, the representatives of 30 Corporations, whom he had occasion to meet on another subject, were unanimous in thinking such an extension undesirable and dangerous. The Chief Constable of Sheffield said he would not like to be responsible for order if voting was to be carried on in the dark. Since then a Circular had been sent to the 28 Corporations, including those of Ashton-under-Lyne, Birmingham, Blackburn, Bradford, Burnley, Chester, and Edinburgh, and of that number only seven were favourable to this extension. For these reasons he supported experimental legislation.

Mr. HIBBERT said, he did not intend to keep the House long after the able speeches that had been made; but he wished to state the peculiar position in which he was placed as regarded the Bill before the House. The opinions of Town Clerks had been quoted in favour of the measure; but he looked at the matter from a much broader point of view. He thought, from many of the speeches heard that day, and from the evidence which was taken by the Committee, they could not come to any other conclusion than that there were several reasons why the hours of polling should be extended; while, at the same time, something, he thought, might be said why the proposed alteration should not be extended to every town. He himself did not certainly approve of all the details of the proposal as contained in the Bill before the House, for he did not think it desirable that a hard-and-fast line should be made to apply to every borough in the Kingdom, whether it was a large borough or a small one; but, at the same time, he could not admit the distinction which had been made by several hon. Members who had spoken as to the great difference between large and small boroughs. He thought the distinction which ought to be made was whether a borough had a large working-class population or not, because the only reason for the measure before the House was to meet the wants and requirements of a certain class of people who could not, under the present law, give their vote in the time laid down by the Act of Parliament. His hon. Friend who moved the rejection of the Bill, in his pleasant speech, seemed to be perfectly satisfied to have things as they were. He took for his text, “Whatever is, is best;” and if, when the hours were fixed, it had been laid down that they should be from 8 in the morning till 8 in the evening, he thought his hon. Friend would have accepted them, and been just as strongly in favour of those hours as he was in favour of the present ones. Let them consider what the position of affairs was when the law was passed. When the Act which at present regulated the hours of polling was passed there were only a very few working men in the constituencies. He would only mention one case of his own borough, which would show what a great difference there was between the old suffrage and the present one. Before the last Reform Act the number of constituents in his borough was somewhere between 2,000 and 3,000, and very few of those of the working-class character; but at the present time, since the Reform Act, there were about 23,000, so that they might say that at the present time there were nearly 20,000—certainly 18,000 or 19,000—out of 23,000 voters, who were of the working classes; and it was on that ground that he supported the proposition for the extension of the hours of polling, because he could not think that those who were engaged in the various industries in the country—and particularly those who worked in factories—were enabled to record their votes, within the time specified by the Act of Parliament, in the easy manner which was desirable. So far as his own borough was concerned, he was prepared to admit that the employers of labour there nearly always, on the afternoon of the Election day, closed their mills; but they did so because of the interest felt in the Election, and because of the excitement which was manifested. But they had no right to expect that employers of labour would do such a thing, and they ought really not to be put to such an inconvenience, and to the loss of even half-a-day's profit, for such a purpose. There was a great deal more to be said in favour of municipal elections than Parliamentary. Parliamentary Elections did not take place so often, perhaps not more than once in four or five years; therefore, the loss of a day's work and pay was of comparatively little moment; but municipal elections occurred once a-year, and the working people did not care about sacrificing a day's labour on every occasion. They were thus debarred, under the present system, from recording their votes. If they compared the number of votes given at Parliamentary and municipal Elections, they would find that the votes given at the latter were fewer than those given at the former. That was, no doubt, owing to the reason that people did not care to lose their day's work for a municipal election. The hon. Gentleman who last addressed the House suggested that they should try the experiment, as they had now the chance of doing, by the Act applying to the Metropolis; but he wanted to know why the working classes of the country should be left without an opportunity of recording their votes, as many, indeed, were while the experiment was being tried? He thought there was nothing to show the House that there was any reason to fear any great danger from the change that was proposed. As to the question of riots, he thought riots had ceased in our Elections since the passing of the Ballot Act; for in no case, with one exception, had a riot taken place at an Election since the passing of the Act. If the polling was to go on until 8 o'clock at night, in his opinion, there would be just as much quiet as when it was closed at 4. He knew from personal experience that at Elections the military had had to be called into towns in order to preserve the peace until the close of the poll; but the reason why the presence of the military was needed was because the people knew from hour to hour what was the state of the poll, and on that account there was the greatest excitement, and in many cases, riot. In one instance he remembered he had to declare the poll at 11 o'clock at night to some 20,000 people, but there was no rioting, only great excitement; and he believed that there would never be anything worse if they did not close the poll till 8 o'clock at night when the proceedings were carried out under the Ballot. With regard to the inconvenience which some hon. Gentlemen thought might be experienced in large bodies of workpeople coming to the poll together, he did not share in that fear, and thought that intimidation had also ceased from the time the Ballot Act was passed. He would not say there were no cases of bribery and treating; but that was generally carried on in secret and in the dark, and had no reference whatever to the time the poll was closed. What was really needed to stop personation was not so much fixing the hours of closing the poll at an early or late period; but what was wanted was to divide the district into a great number of small polling districts, so that one or two persons should know every voter in the district and would thus be able to detect any attempt at deceit. He thought that much greater protection than anything else. It had been stated that only seven boroughs were favourable to the proposal of extending the hours of polling. He contended that even if that were so, the law should be altered so as to meet their wishes, while the other towns could retain the Act as now provided. He would suggest that the best method in which to accomplish that would be to give the authorities in those particular towns the power to extend the hours according to the number of the population, so that those classes of the people who were really unable to vote in the given time, and needed the extension in order to record their votes, should be enabled to do so.

Mr. Hibbert

COLONEL BERESFORD supported the second reading of the Bill, as all the evidence taken before the Committee went to show how desirable it was, in the interests of the working man, that he should have every facility for recording his vote. He was not afraid of shadows, and, therefore, paid no attention to the argument that the change would lead to riot and disturbance. He wished to see every one of his constituents enabled to give his vote at the Parliamentary Election. If the Bill were not passed, the practical effect would be the disfranchisement of large numbers of the working classes, who had conducted themselves very well at the London School Board elections, when the poll was open until 8 o'clock in the evening. He had great confidence in the working classes, and he hoped the Bill would be passed as a measure of justice.

MR. H. SAMUELSON likewise supported the second reading of the Bill. He believed that if the hours of polling were extended, there would be less danger of the polling day becoming a kind of holiday; and that being so, there would be less drunkenness and disturbance. It might also tend to reduce the expense, because, possibly, fewer polling stations would be required. He had no hesitation in saying that at present a large number of voters were disfranchised simply because they could not attend the polling station within the hours at present fixed; and he considered that the balance of argument was strongly in favour of the Bill. The importance to be attached to the opinion of Sir Joseph Heron, who did not claim any personal experience, was to be qualified by his remark that it was monstrous to expect pollclerks to work for 12 hours a-day.

MR. SERJEANT SPINKS opposed the Bill, and remarked that this was a very different measure to that which was recently introduced having reference to the Metropolis. The Committee of 1877 upon the Hours of Polling in the Metropolitan Districts, of which he was a Member, sat to inquire into the hours of polling to be provided for a particular district, a district comprising some 10 or 11 boroughs, lying close together, and having similar businesses, trades, and occupations. With regard to every one of those boroughs there was most clear and distinct evidence before the Committee to the effect that there existed in each of such boroughs a class of men who were so situated that, under the existing hours of polling, it was impossible for many of them to exercise the franchise. After fully weighing the evidence, he came to the conclusion that he could not do otherwise than give his vote in favour of the proposition of the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) to extend the hours of polling in the Metropolitan boroughs. But now they had before them a Bill to extend the hours of polling, not in 10 or 11 boroughs lying together, and thus peculiarly situated, but probably in 200 boroughs, situated in various parts of the three Kingdoms. The evidence pointing to the necessity for the present Bill was of the most meagre description. There were a few boroughs—such as Liverpool and Glasgow—in which it might be well to extend the hours of polling, and if a Bill for any such purpose were introduced he should most probably vote for it; but when he found that this proposition was intended to apply to large and small boroughs alike—to boroughs even with an electorate of less than 1,000—he could not but think that he was right in opposing it. It was true that the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) had placed himself in the hands of the House, inasmuch as he had expressed his willingness to have the Bill cut down in any way in Committee, providing the general principle were adopted. This could not be considered a satisfactory way in which to bring a Bill before the House; in fact, it could only be characterized as angling for votes. There was one argument that certainly weighed with him in favour of the Bill, and that was the very awkward predicament in which some working men were placed as regarded the recording of their votes. In the generality of instances, however, masters afforded facilities for their employés to vote, considering that it would be improper and a scandal to place impediments in the way; and he (Mr. Serjeant Spinks) was inclined to think it would be wise that some arrangement should be made by which it should not be in the power of any man to put obstacles in the way of the exercise of the franchise. If a clear and distinct proposition of that nature were introduced, he should have no hesitation as to the way in which he would record his vote. Looking to the Bill itself, which was of a very large and sweeping character; to the willingness on the part of the promoters to have it cut down in Committee to any extent, which showed their want of confidence in the Bill they had introduced; and to the opinion of his hon. Friend and Colleague (Mr. Hibbert), who spoke in a rather faltering manner in favour of the Bill, he had no hesitation in voting against it.

MR. W. E. FORSTER supported the Bill. He was anxious to see the line that would be taken, not only by hon. Gentlemen opposite, but by the Government. The hon. Gentleman who moved the rejection of the Bill (Mr. Assheton) seemed to think there was really no grievance that it was necessary to attend to; while the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. A. Gathorne-Hardy), who was on the Committee, and had made an able speech, did not deny that there was some grievance in the case of large towns; but he seemed to suppose that we must be content with what he called "experimental legislation" in the Metropolis, in order to see how that would work by the next Election. He (Mr. W. E. Forster) saw no reason why the Metropolis should be regarded as a test for other large towns, and by which we were to ascertain whether the hours of polling should be extended or not. He was anxious to hear what the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department (Sir Matthew White Ridley), who knew the question in all its bearings, and who was besides, he (Mr. W. E. Forster) might say, the impartial Chairman of the Committee, had to say on this subject. It could not for a moment be supposed that the Government would allow a matter like this to rest till after the next Election. It was a small matter in one sense, but it was a very large matter in another. If they took the arguments against the change, it would be found that none of them were arguments of any great force, or were what might be called comprehensive arguments. On the other hand, it had been clearly shown that the matter was a very grave one. Indeed, by our legislation, we had given a very large number of working men the right to vote. The State had imposed upon them the duty of voting, and expected them to vote; yet, by the arrangements of our polling hours, we made it as difficult as possible for them to exercise that right. That, really, was a great grievance. He, therefore, could not suppose that the Government intended to go to the country at the General Election on the principle that they would refuse to listen to arguments which showed how a large number of persons in important constituencies might vote without any great inconvenience or loss to themselves. He was sure the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department was not of that opinion, because the Report which he drew up would contradict it. It was a very near Committee in point of opinion. The morning on which the Report was drawn up there happened to be a majority on the side of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain); but after the Report of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) had been taken in place of that of the Chairman, an additional Member came in who supported the Chairman in bringing back the Report to his own views. He (Mr. W. E. Forster) thought the Under Secretary would not have been sorry if the Report of the hon. Member for Glasgow had been taken. But what was the Report which they had got? The first part of it was a very strong argument in favour of the change, and that it should not be put off. He would ask the hon. Member for Clitheroe (Mr. Assheton) to pay attention to what was the opinion of the Government through the Under Secretary, and what was the opinion of the Committee. It was the opinion of the Committee that, for various reasons—

Mr. Serjeant Spinks

"The artisans had been prevented from recording their votes, and had been put to great inconvenience where they had done so."

They could not have stronger evidence than that. It would simply be trifling with the House to attempt to bring forward any grievances after quoting those words. The next paragraph stated—

"The witnesses were unable to suggest any other remedy than to extend the hours of polling, and the Committee were satisfied there was no other way of meeting the difficulty."

Well, the Government, not being anxious to bring in a Bill, suggested that the matter should stand over for some time, which they did not attempt to limit, for the purpose of seeing the effect of the extension in the Metropolis. That looked very much as if, when the suggestion was made, there was an idea on the part of the Government that we should have had a General Election before the time contemplated. No one now had any idea when the next Election was to come. He did not suppose the Government meant to say they would allow this matter to stand over, and that they would go before the country knowing that a large number of men would be unable to record their votes. He could not help thinking that, in the sort of statement they would make as to the way in which they were going to settle this matter, they would also give some information about the General Election. Leaving that matter, however, he would just say a word as to the line taken by the hon. Member for Clitheroe. The hon. Member made a very good speech, considering the bad case which he had. Surely, the ground which he took would not be taken not merely by the Government, but by any number of Gentlemen in the House, no matter on which side they might sit. What was it that the hon. Gentleman said? Why, that if the working classes were not willing to give up this small part of their income for the purpose of recording their votes, they did not deserve to have votes, and that the House ought not to interfere. Now, that was pure class legislation. The House, it was argued, ought not to interfere, because it was only the working classes who were concerned. Hon. Gentlemen might think that part of a day's wages was a very small thing to lose, and so it would be to hon. Gentlemen; but to the working men it was a very large sum indeed. Would hon. Gentlemen expect their middle-class supporters to sacrifice the whole of a day's profits for them? The House had no right to condemn the working men to it, nor had they a right to blame them if they did not make the sacrifice. The hon. Gentleman said that working men were too timid to ask their employers for a holiday. He (Mr. W. E. Forster) saw no reason why working men should be compelled to go and ask their employers, who often differed from them in politics, for a holiday in order to go to the poll. Again, the hon. Gentleman said the working men who did not vote were the most ignorant, vacillating, and idle portion of the community, and, therefore, we ought to do without their votes. He (Mr. W. E. Forster) could not for one moment believe that the Under Secretary would take that ground. He would not attempt to answer the objections to the Bill, except in a very few remarks. They had already been well answered. He might just say this—that they had now found out that any objection which had any real force had lost that force. Three objections had been alluded to—namely, the increased expense, the danger of personation, and disorder. As regarded expense, that would be a very small addition, and would only bear a very small proportion to the general expenses of the Election. With respect to the danger of personation, he thought they had got to that point in the improvement in gas-light, to say nothing of the electric light, that they might fairly trust that the authorities would be able to turn up the light on those who came to the poll so as to defeat any attempts in that direction. The only objection in former times which had any force was that of disorder. His hon. Friend (Mr. Chamberlain), in his very able speech in bringing on the Bill, gave an interesting history of the proceedings with regard to the hours of polling. The hon. Member for Birmingham complained of the vacillation of the late Government in dealing with this question. He (Mr. W. E. Forster) would remind the hon. Gentleman that when he came to bring a measure through the House of Commons he would have to be very careful of side-issues. When he (Mr. W. E. Forster) brought in the Ballot Bill, the House and the country were not convinced there would be no disorder in evening voting, because they judged of the danger by the then system of voting. The experiment might have been dangerous then. He had confidence as to how the Ballot would prevent disorder, but the House had not; and, in order to secure the passing of the Ballot Bill, he was obliged to give up the question of the hours of polling. Now they had experience to guide them. Now that the people were not made acquainted with the state of the poll, chances of disorder had been very much diminished. Experience had also been gained of the working of School Board elections. There was one objection, however, which he thought had something in it, although it was not a very strong objection after all. He believed there were several towns in which the grievance was not a particularly severe one. It was felt in several large towns that the present hours were quite sufficient for the purpose, and there was no general desire to lengthen them. He was glad, therefore, to find that the hon. Member who introduced the Bill was quite willing to make a limitation as to boroughs. No doubt, there were many small boroughs where no change was needed; but, on the other hand, there were boroughs, not large, like Morpeth, where an alteration would be of great service. He (Mr. W. E. Forster) had hoped the hon. Member for Morpeth (Mr. Burt) would have been able to show the House how the present system worked there. The presumption, however, ought to be that the less hours were necessary for large boroughs. He would not lay down any exact limit as to population. That was a matter to be decided by a Committee on the Bill. He thought that in making the presumption for less hours in large and for the present hours in small boroughs, power might be given to the Town Council to determine what the hours should be—say, for a particular number of years, giving the Council power to lengthen the hours if they thought fit. He (Mr. W. E. Forster) understood his hon. Friend was only asking the House to vote for this principle—namely, that instead of compelling working men to vote at great inconvenience, and at a great sacrifice to themselves, they should so arrange the hours of the poll as to enable them to vote without incurring any loss. That was a principle for which he (Mr. W. E. Forster) should gladly vote. He could not understand how any hon. Member on either side of the House, much less any responsible Government, could refuse to support that principle.

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY said, the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down wished to obtain some information from him as to whether the question before the House would be dealt with by Her Majesty's Government before the General Election, and also as to when the General Election might be expected to take place. He would state, at the outset, that he had no information as to what the Government intended to do in this matter, and still less had he any idea as to when a General Election might be expected. The right hon. Gentleman had done him no more than justice, when he said that the inquiry last year had been conducted throughout in an unbiassed manner. The Report proposed by him, to which reference had been made, spoke as to the view he held. It appeared to him—and the Report stated it—that in many boroughs of large extent the present hours of polling did impose a difficulty upon the working classes, and, therefore, a grievance existed in the way of recording their votes. He felt that; and he also felt that, as far as the evidence went, no means of meeting that grievance had been shown, except the extension of the hours of polling to 8 o'clock in the evening. The only way in which Party came in was, that the Conservatives were, perhaps, more cautious than the Liberals in determining upon the means of meeting a grievance which they did not deny. He was himself more alive to the difficulties and dangers of the subject than some Members of the Committee. On the question of increased expenditure there was not much to be said, and too much stress ought not to be laid on that ground of objection. Sufficient importance had not, however, been given to the opinions expressed by the Mayors and other authorities who had been examined, and who were responsible for order in their several localities. It was not quite a fair way of getting rid of their objections by saying that those gentlemen were personally interested in preventing an extension of hours. He attached some importance to the fears they expressed; and, besides, he would appeal to hon. Members who had any knowledge of the subject as to the sort of thing which went on during the last half-hour before the close of the poll in some of the smaller constituencies. That, he thought, was the critical time when bribery might be expected to prevail. It was a question whether the practice of bribery at Parliamentary Elections had been diminished to any material extent by the passing of the Ballot Act; but he thought no one could doubt that the extension of the franchise had tended in that direction by largely increasing the number of persons entitled to vote, and so making bribery a much more costly process than it was in the days of small constituencies. No one could doubt that the question proposed to be dealt with by the Bill of the hon. Member for Birmingham was one beset with difficulties, and, at the same time, presenting points in which real grievances existed; but the details involved were not easy of settlement. There was much to be said in favour of the suggestion which had been made by the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron), that in boroughs of above 100,000 population the presumption should be that the hours of polling were extended to 8 o'clock, and that in boroughs below that number the presumption should be the other way; but that, in both cases, discretion should be given to the Town Councils either to extend or diminish the hours. That proposal had, to his mind, some considerable weight; but he felt there were considerable objections also to intrusting such powers to Town Councils, inasmuch as it might introduce an element of discord. He apprehended that if such a measure were agreed to, it would have to be for a fixed period of years and under certain limitations. No doubt, the proposition was worthy of consideration; but the Bill before the House was an entirely different matter. It was not in any sense a carrying out of the Report of the Committee, or of the alternative Report proposed by the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron). The difference between the two Parties in the Committee was not so very great. It was really the difference which naturally existed between the two political Parties of the State. His own Party regarded with more caution the proposed change, and thought that time should be given to see how the experiment worked in the Metropolis. They also foresaw a greater element of danger than did the others; and, consequently, he had now to recommend to the House the Report of the Committee rather than the Bill of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain), which proposed to enact that in every borough in England, Scotland, and Ireland, the hours should be extended to 8 o'clock, and that not only for Parliamentary Elections, but apparently also for all elections of whatever kind. He thought the House could hardly be expected to agree to that. It was said by some, as, for instance, by the right hon. the Member for Bradford, that voting for a Bill like that was no more than voting for an abstract Resolution in favour of extension of hours, and in favour of remedying what was, doubtless, an admitted grievance in many parts of England. For his own part, he declined to take that view; and it appeared to him that if the Bill were to be made acceptable to the House, it would have to be altered to one of an entirely different character. The Government, therefore, could not assent to the second reading of this Bill, which would mean immediate legislation on a uniform rule. There were cases in which the voters had not an opportunity of voting without sacrifice of working time, and that could not be the intention of Parliament; but this crude and undigested scheme did not meet the difficulty. Any proposal on the subject must recognize the fact that in a smaller borough, owing to the distance of workmen from their homes, more time would be required than in the large boroughs, where they lived close to their work, and he did not think this Bill afforded a satisfactory solution.

Mr. W. E. Forster

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, in reply, expressed his regret that, speaking on the part of the Government, the Under Secretary had not been able to give the House some more definite information as to the course they intended to take. The question now remained in this state—that here was an acknowledged grievance which the Government distinctly refused to entertain.

Mr. GOLDNEY opposed the Bill, on the ground that its principle had been tried and had failed.

Question put.

The House divided :—Ayes 165 ; Noes 190 : Majority 25. — (Div. List, No. 117.)

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Second Reading put off for three months.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACTS.

Select Committee appointed, "to inquire into the Contagious Diseases Acts, 1866—1869, their administration, operation, and effect:— Mr. CAVENDISH BENTINCK, Mr. STANSFELD, Colonel ALEXANDER, Sir HARCOURT JOHNSTONE, Viscount CRICHTON, Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE, General SHUTE, Mr. BURT, Mr. BULWER, Mr. O'SHAUGHNESSY, and Five Members to be nominated by the Committee of Selection:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

Ordered, That all Reports and Returns thereto relating be referred to the said Committee.

Ordered, That it be an Instruction to the Committee, that they have power to receive Evidence which may be tendered concerning similar systems in British Colonies or in other Countries, and to report whether the said Contagious Acts should be maintained, extended, amended, or repealed.—(Colonel Stanley.)

House adjourned at five minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 12th June, 1879.

MINUTES.]—SUPPLY—considered in Committee—Resolutions [June 9] reported.

EAST INDIA REVENUE ACCOUNTS—considered in Committee—Adjourned Debate [May 22] resumed.

PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—East India Loan (£5,000,000) [197].

Committee—Common Law Procedure and Judicature Acts Amendment [181], [House counted out].

QUESTIONS.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—ESTIMATE OF EXPENDITURE.

QUESTIONS.

MR. CHILDERS asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, When the Estimate of the expenditure for the War in South Africa during the present financial year may be expected to be laid upon the Table?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I have been anxious not to lay the Estimate of the expenditure for the South African War before the House until I was in a position to form as accurate an idea as possible of the amount likely to be required. That depends on two circumstances—the expenditure per month, and the length of time which the war is likely to last. At the present moment we are in a position of some difficulty, especially in regard to the second of those considerations. The latest information that I have as to the actual amount of expenditure does not go down later than the 20th of April. The expenditure, according to the information I have to that date, was proceeding at the rate of somewhat more than £500,000 per month. We have, I hope, cleared up the expenditure to the 31st of March, and, therefore, if during the months of April, May, and June, the expenditure is to be taken as proceeding at the same rate, you would have an expenditure of £1,500,000 or £1,600,000; and if the war be concluded, as we hope it may, by the end of June, there would probably be nothing to disturb the calculations of the Budget. Of course, I am not at present in a position to say when we may hope for a termination of the war; neither am I in a position to say that the expenditure is now going on at the same rate as at the beginning of April. I think it is for the convenience of the House that I should defer laying any statement on the Table till I am in a position to make one that will command more confidence than any which I could make at this moment, and I think my right hon. Friend will see that it is better that I should defer it for some time longer. Of course, we must take a Vote some little time before the close of the Session, and when we do so, I shall be able to state the grounds on which the Estimate is based.

MR. CHILDERS: Did we clearly understand from the earlier part of the right hon. Baronet's answer that up to the end of the last financial year the whole charge of the war has been met—not only the charge on the Exchequer which comes in the shape of drafts on home, but the whole real cost to that date?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Yes; so far as our accounts go, we believe that is the case. I always speak with some diffidence about accounts from a Colony at that distance; but as far as we can make out, we believe that charge is covered by what was advanced in the last financial year.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL, who had given Notice of his intention to inquire whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Estimate of £1,500,000 was likely to be exceeded, said, that after the statement just made, he did not think it necessary to put his Question.

ARMY MEDICAL SERVICE—INVALIDED MEDICAL OFFICERS.—QUESTION.

MR. GOURLEY asked the Secretary of State for War, If the rule exists that medical officers of the Army who from the effects of climate are invalided home before completing their term of service, are after the expiration of their sick leave placed on temporary half-pay, if declared by a medical board to be unfit to resume their appointments abroad; and if such is the regulation, whether, owing to the reduced state of the Army medical department and the heavy strain recently put upon it, a considerable saving of public money might not be effected by employing such officers as might be found fit by a medical board on home service?

COLONEL STANLEY: Medical officers who have been invalided home are, by the Regulations, placed on temporary half-pay for six months, and if they are then found unable to return to their stations are placed on the permanent list. It would not be for the good of the Service to employ those officers who are temporarily incapacitated to fill up vacancies abroad; but as regards the employment of such officers at home, it is contemplated so to employ officers on permanent half-pay in certain stations where their services can be utilized.

THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT.—QUESTION.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he will direct that the Analysed Statement of the Public Income and Expenditure, as shown in Parliamentary Papers 452 and 387 of Sessions 1877 and 1878, be hereafter incorporated in the annual Finance Statement; whether he will direct that the balance sheets of the National Debt Commissioners be dated on the 31st March, so as to correspond with the balance sheet of the Imperial Treasury; and, whether he will provide for the production at the earliest moment of the Public Annual Finance Accounts, which last year were circulated only after the close of the Session?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that he understood the Annual Financial Statement to mean the Budget; and though the Analysed Statements of his right hon. Friend were very valuable and interesting, he should not like to alter the usual form adopted in the Statements of the Chancellor of the Exchequer without very careful consideration. To do so would, of course, disturb the calculations of finance with reference to former years. With regard to the second part of the Question, he could not give directions as to the dating of the balance sheets, because some accounts were by legislation ordered to be brought down to a particular date, and there would probably be difficulty and expense in making alterations in them. In regard to the publication of the Public Annual Finance Accounts, the Government was anxious to do all in its power to produce them as early as possible; but it was more important that they should be correct than that they should be early; and the Clerk of the Treasury, who was charged with the duty of preparing them, was so fully burdened with work that the Government could only say that it would use its best endeavours to procure an early publication.

NORTHERN BORNEO—CESSION OF LAND, &c.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, with regard to the cession of territory in Northern Borneo to a British trading Company, When Papers on the matter will be presented to Parliament; whether those Papers will contain information as to the difficulty which has arisen between the British and Spanish Governments on the subject; and, whether it is true, as stated in the "Standard" of the 6th of June, that the Governor and Commander in Chief in Labuan has been to the North East coast of Borneo to protest against the hoisting of the Spanish flag, the "Standard" adding that His Excellency was supported by two ships of war?

MR. BOURKE: In answer to the Question of the hon. Baronet, I have to say that the proposal to cede the territory alluded to is still under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government. No decision has yet been arrived at. When the question is settled Papers will be submitted. I cannot say that any difficulty has arisen between the British and Spanish Governments on the subject. Certainly, a correspondence is going on between the two Governments; and when that correspondence is ripe for publication, there will be no objection to lay it on the Table. It is quite true that the Governor and Commander-in-Chief in Labuan has visited the North-East coast of Borneo for the purpose of protesting against the hoisting of the Spanish flag, and his visit was made in a gunboat, which is the only convenient means of locomotion in that part of the world.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I should like to know definitely, whether anything has yet been decided regarding the cession of territory, or whether any responsibility has been incurred by the British Government; and, also, whether, before any step is taken, full information will be given to the House?

MR. BOURKE: That is another question altogether. As I have said, negotiations on the subject are going on. But whether the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs may think it desirable that they should be made public, is a question which I am not prepared to answer without Notice.

AFRICA—WEST COAST—SIERRA LEONE CUSTOMS DUTIES.—QUESTION.

MR. A. M'ARTHUR asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether disturbances have taken place in Scaries River, near Sierra Leone, in consequence of attempts having been made to impose Customs Duties upon the natives; whether the natives of this part of the coast are subjects of Great Britain or amenable to British authority; and, whether the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown as to the legality of the proposed taxation has been obtained?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I think the hon. Member's Question is based upon some misapprehension of what has occurred. In order to avoid loss to the Customs revenue of Sierra Leone, it has been considered necessary to establish a Customs station on the Island of Kikonkeh, which was ceded to Her Majesty in 1847. Duties would, of course, be levied there from the merchants, and the Chiefs in the neighbouring rivers are stated by Governor Rowe to make no objection to what has been done; though, before the matter was explained, there was some opposition on the Island itself to the steps taken by Commander Alington for the purpose, but nothing at all that amounted to a disturbance. Of course, Customs duties can legally be levied in British territory.

CEYLON—FOOD SCARCITY.

QUESTION.

MR. POTTER asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If the attention of Government has been called to the statement in the "Times" of June 3rd, on the authority of its correspondent at Colombo, by which it appears that there is the greatest scarcity of food, approaching even to famine, in certain districts of Ceylon; and, whether, under such circumstances, the Government will suspend the Import Duties on grain into Ceylon, as they have done into Cyprus, and also suspend the taxes on grain grown in the island, which tend to discourage its cultivation?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: The statement in The Times referred to by the hon. Member appears to complain not so much of a scarcity of food in Ceylon as of a deficiency of means to purchase cotton goods. There has, however, been considerable temporary distress, in the earlier part of the present year, in some districts of Ceylon; but measures were at once taken by the Colonial Government to alleviate it: and there is every reason to anticipate that, owing to this action, and to the rains which fell towards the latter part of March, it will very soon have entirely passed away—if, indeed, it has not already done so. There is nothing in the circumstances which would warrant the suspension of the import duties on grain; and the hon. Member is already aware of the action which has been taken by the Government on the general question of the grain tax from my reply to a Question asked by him on April 3.

Sir Charles W. Dilke

INDIA—THE KIRWEE PRIZE MONEY.
QUESTION.

GENERAL SHUTE asked the Under Secretary of State for India, When the complete accounts of the whole proceeds of all the moveable property of ex-chiefs of Kirwee, including the funds retained by the Indian Government, will be presented to the House, in accordance with the Parliamentary Orders of 1873 and 1874; and, if he will be good enough to state the cause of the delay?

MR. E. STANHOPE: The Return is complete. All that passed into the hands of Government, as indicated in the Orders of the Houses of Parliament, was contained in the Return of 1876. I presume, however, that the Question of my hon. and gallant Friend refers specially to certain promissory notes. He will find a list of those notes at page 15 of a Return as to Kirwee prize-money, presented to this House in 1870. The matter was fully discussed in the House of Lords in 1877, and my noble Friend, Lord Salisbury, explained that a decision had been come to on the subject in 1869, after the most lengthened and careful consideration of successive Governments.

ARMY DISCIPLINE AND REGULATION
BILL—LEGISLATION AS TO BOOTY OF WAR.—QUESTION.

GENERAL SHUTE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will consider the justice and advisability of adding a Clause to the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill, giving to the Army the same right of appeal as regards "booty of war," as the Navy enjoys in cases of "prize of war," not in order to affect the right of the Crown to grant prize, but in case of dispute to regulate its distribution?

COLONEL STANLEY, in reply, said, that Her Majesty's Government, by the advice of the Privy Council, could order all questions with reference to "booty of war" to be submitted to the Court of Admiralty, under the Act of 3 & 4 Vict. It did not seem expedient to make this an imperative obligation; and, in any case, the place for it would not be in the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill, but in a measure to amend the law of prizes.

POST OFFICE—EASTERN MAIL CON-TRACT.—QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Postmaster General, with reference to the new contract for the Eastern Mails, If he will be so good as to explain how the cost is to be distributed between the Mother Country, India, and the Colonies, and especially how the total amount contracted for is to be divided between the Indian line to Bombay and that to Galle and China; and, whether the Australian Colonies are to pay their fair share of the latter with reference to work done?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, that calculations were now being made for the purpose of ascertaining what proportion of the subsidy would be paid by India and what by Ceylon and Hong Kong. A share of the cost which represented the carriage of the Australian mails would be borne by the Mother Country, in accordance with the arrangements under the postal regulations agreed to with the Government of Australia.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked for an explanation of the principles on which the cost would be distributed?

LORD JOHN MANNERS thought it would not be for the convenience of the House if, in answer to a Question, a Minister was expected to enter into the principles of a scheme which had not yet been sanctioned by the House.

CHURCH OF SCOTLAND—RETURN OF COMMUNICANTS.—QUESTION.

MR. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been directed to an article in the "Scotsman," dated 27th of May, which throws serious doubts on the truthfulness of a Return recently presented to this House, entitled "Communicants of the Church of Scotland;" and, whether, considering the gravity of the charge contained in the article, the Government will appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the truth or falsity of the figures returned as correct; and, at the same time, confer on the Commission power to purge the roll of any congregation, if it think it necessary, so as to arrive at a true statement of the real number of bona fide members?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. WATSON): We have no reason whatever to doubt the genuineness of the Returns laid on the Table of the House, and, therefore, it is not proposed to enter into any such inquiry.

CUSTOMS RE-ORGANISATION.

QUESTION.

MR. SULLIVAN asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If the scheme of the re-organisation of the Customs Service now before the Treasury includes the superior officers of the out-door department of the Customs?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: No, Sir; these officers are not included in the scheme.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE (IRELAND)— BUSINESS IN THE CHANCERY DIVISION.—QUESTION.

MR. SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If it is a fact that the business of the Chief Clerks' Offices in the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice in Ireland is in great arrear, and that in some instances certificates of accounts which have been taken in their offices and passed by them over twelve months ago have not yet been put into draft or passed and signed by the judges?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. GIBSON): Sir, in reference to the Question of the hon. and learned Member, I communicated with the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, who is not aware of any case of the kind, and he thinks that if such cases did occur they were exceptional. One of the Chief Clerks—the clerk to the Master of the Rolls in Ireland—was some time ago seriously ill, which might have caused some delay; for, under existing arrangements, no one in the office of the Chief Clerk can perform his duties, and this may have created some inconvenience. The Lord Chancellor of Ireland, however, in connection with the pending re-organisation of Departments, is considering this question, and hopes to be able to adjust matters so as to prevent delay in future.

SLAVE TRADE IN SOUTH AFRICA— TREATY WITH PORTUGAL.

QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs,

The Lord Advocate

If a new Treaty has been concluded with Portugal for the suppression of the Slave Trade in South Africa; and if he will shortly lay it upon the Table?

MR. BOURKE: I cannot say, in strictness, that a new Treaty has been concluded for the suppression of the Slave Trade; but a Treaty has been signed with the view of regulating the commerce between the two countries. One of the objects of that Treaty is to gain the advantage to English commerce of a harbour at Delagoa Bay. It also contains some Articles which have for their object the suppression of the Slave Trade both on the East Coast and in the interior of Africa. The Treaty has been signed, but has not yet been ratified. It will, of course, have to be submitted to the Colonies for consideration. Some time must, therefore, elapse before it can be presented to Parliament.

TURKEY—THE TURKISH GUARANTEED LOAN, 1855.—QUESTIONS.

MR. DODSON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether any, and, if any, what portion of the sum of £66,022 4s. 11d. which appears from the Second Report of the Select Committee on Public Accounts to have remained due on the 14th of May last from the Porte to the British and French Governments for advances made by them in consequence of the default of the Porte to pay the dividends due in February 1878 and in February 1879 on the Turkish Guaranteed Loan of 1855, specially charged upon the Egyptian tribute, has been received from the Turkish or Egyptian Governments; what is the exact sum ascertained to be payable by Her Majesty's Government to the Porte as the average excess of the revenue of Cyprus over expenditure during the last five years of Turkish Administration; whether the payments of this sum are to be made half-yearly or at what intervals; when the first payment was made or will become due, and the amount thereof; and, when the first payment in respect of the fixed annual sum of £5,000 to be paid by Her Majesty's Government in commutation of the rights reserved to the Ottoman Crown and Government under Article IV. of the Annex to the Convention of Defensive Alliance between Great Britain and Turkey of 4th June 1878, will become due?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: With respect to the first Question, I am sorry to say that no further portion of the sum of £66,000, due from the Porte to the British and French Governments in respect of the loan, has been received by Her Majesty's Government either from the Porte or from the Khedive. With regard to the latter Questions of the right hon. Member, I am not in a position to answer them at present. They are still under discussion.

MR. DODSON: I should like to follow up the Question asked by another. I should like to know, Whether the Government are entitled to deduct from the surplus revenue of Cyprus to be paid to the Porte any of the money which the Porte has in default failed to pay this country?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: That is, of course, a question connected with the negotiations and discussions now going forward.

MR. MONK: May I ask if the French Government have paid their share?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Yes.

CYPRUS—THE NEW COINAGE.

QUESTION.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Under what authority a coinage of bronze piastres, bearing the effigy of Her Majesty on one side with the words "Victoria Queen," and on the other the word "Cyprus," has been issued from the Royal Mint, as stated in the last Mint Report, page 11; and, whether such an issue is consistent with the rights of Sovereignty generally understood to have been reserved to the Sultan?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The coinage to which the hon. Member refers was issued by command of Her Majesty on my recommendation as the Master of the Mint. With regard to the second Question, I do not conceive that there is anything inconsistent with the rights of Sovereignty over Cyprus reserved to the Sultan in issuing from the Mint a coinage for circulation in Cyprus, in which the coinage of many nations is already in circulation.

CYPRUS—REVENUE AND EXPENDITURE ACCOUNTS.—QUESTION.

MR. DODSON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs,

Whether he can state when he will be prepared to lay before the House Accounts or Estimates of the Revenue and Expenditure of Cyprus under British Administration?

MR. BOURKE: It is our intention to present the Estimates and Accounts as soon as possible; but I cannot say just now when they will be completed.

LAW OF COPYRIGHT—LEGISLATION.

QUESTION.

MR. HANBURY TRACY asked the Postmaster General, If it is still the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill to deal with the Law of Copyright; and, if so, if he can state when he will be prepared to submit it to the House?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, he hoped to be able during the Session to bring in a Bill on the subject of the Law of Copyright, not with any hope of passing it; but in order that it might be circulated in the Colonies, which would be affected by any change.

NAVY—PENSIONS OF SERGEANTS OF ROYAL MARINES.—QUESTION.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether it is a fact that, whilst the pension of a sergeant-major in the Army is 3*s.* per diem, and that of a staff or other sergeants 2*s.* 6*d.* per diem, the pension of a sergeant-major in the Royal Marines is only 2*s.* 6*d.* and that of other sergeants 2*s.* 3*d.* per diem; whether a similar difference exists in the relative pay of other officers; and, whether there is any valid reason for the existence of such an inequality; and, if not, whether Her Majesty's Government will take steps to remove that which appears to be an invidious distinction between different branches of the Service?

MR. W. H. SMITH: The difference, which is owing to the improvement recently effected in the Army pensions, between the pensions of sergeant majors of the Marines and of the Army and of other sergeants in the Marines and of the Army is correctly stated by the right hon. Member. There is a difference between the pay of the non-commissioned officers of the Army and the Marines; but I am not prepared to admit that the effect of the conditions under which the Marines serve as compared with those of the Army is, on the whole, unfavourable to the Marines. I will consider with my Colleagues whether any improvement can be made in the rate of pension.

ARMY—COMPULSORY RETIREMENT—
THE ROYAL WARRANT OF MAY, 1878.

QUESTION.

MR. STACPOOLE asked the Secretary of State for War, If it is true that in several cases where, since the promulgation of the Royal Warrant of May 1878, vacancies by death or compulsory retirement at seventy years of age have occurred in the establishment of general officers, majors have not received the promotion to which they are entitled under paragraph 21 f of the Warrant; whether there is any provision in the Warrant rendering it necessary, in order to give the senior major in the Army the right to the brevet rank of lieutenant colonel under the said paragraph, that such vacancy on the establishment of general officers should be filled up; and, if no such provision exists, whether the refusal to senior majors of promotion on the occurrence of such vacancies in the establishment of general officers is not a violation of paragraph 21 f of the Royal Warrant?

COLONEL STANLEY: I do not think there has been any violation of the Royal Warrant. If any name or any personal references be given to me, I shall be able to trace these cases, and possibly be enabled to answer the Question generally. However, I may say this much—that the death or retirement of an officer holding a rank in which there are supernumeraries does not ever create a vacancy.

POST OFFICE — SOLDIERS LETTERS FROM SOUTH AFRICA.—QUESTION.

MR. OLIVER WALKER asked the Postmaster General, If it is true that double postage is charged upon unpaid letters arriving from soldiers serving in South Africa; and, if this is the case, whether he will consider the propriety of remitting the double postage, seeing the difficulty of obtaining stamps at the seat of war?

LORD JOHN MANNERS: Since April last it has been the practice to charge only the ordinary prepaid rates of postage upon letters from officers, soldiers, and seamen serving in South Africa, which reach this country unpaid. If any letters are accidentally charged with double postage, owing to its not being known that they are sent by soldiers, the surcharge is always remitted on application.

GENERAL SHUTE: Will that apply to the letters of officers?

LORD JOHN MANNERS: Yes; of course.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—ALLEGED CRUELTY OF THE BRITISH TROOPS.—QUESTION.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether his attention has been directed to the South African Correspondence of the "Daily Chronicle" of the 3rd instant, in which it is stated that after the Battle of Kambula the defeated Zulus, exhausted with fatigue, fell in hundreds upon the ground, begging for mercy from their pursuers "but were shot, stabbed, or sabred where they lay," and that even though some of them had smeared themselves with blood in order to appear to be wounded and appealed for quarter, they were mercilessly put to death; whether he has seen an extract from the letter of a soldier engaged in the same fight at Kambula, published in the "Tiverton Gazette" of May the 27th, and copied in the "Echo" of the 3rd instant, in which it is avowed that—

"On March the 30th, the day after the battle, about eight miles from camp, we found about five hundred wounded, most of them mortally, and begging us for mercy's sake not to kill them; but they got no chance after what they had done to our comrades at Isandula;"

and, whether operations in South Africa are being conducted by the British troops according to the usages of civilisation?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Sir, the hon. Member evidently seems to expect that I should make myself acquainted with everything that appears in the newspapers on this subject. I make no complaint of that view; but I think we may take it for granted that he complies with that rule himself. Therefore, he must have seen in Wednesday's Times a letter from the War Office, in which it was stated, on behalf of my right hon. and gallant Friend the Secretary of State for War, that the General

Mr. W. H. Smith

Officer commanding Her Majesty's Forces in Natal has been called on to inquire into these allegations, and report whether there is any truth in them. If the hon. Member saw that letter, I cannot tell what object he has in asking this Question. I should not have thought that any Member of this House would have been willing, without necessity, to give pain to men who are serving Her Majesty on the other side of the world by giving to unsupported statements of this kind the stamp of importance, if not of credibility, that they derive from being made the subject of a Question in Parliament; much less that anyone would have based upon such a foundation as this an insinuation that his own countrymen do not conduct war according to the usages of civilization.

MR. O'DONNELL: Mr. Speaker, in order to put myself quite in Order in the remarks I have to make, I shall conclude with a Motion. The right hon. Gentleman asks why—assuming that I had seen the reply of the War Office to some representations made to them by the Aborigines Protection Society—I put the Question to him? Although the interrogatories of the right hon. Baronet were not put in the most courteous form, or with the most careful regard for the independent rights of Members of this House, I will beg to answer them; and I hope he will consider himself perfectly satisfied by the time I have sat down. The reply to the Aborigines Protection Society seemed to me to be excessively inadequate—considering the circumstances of the case, considering the wrong committed, and the undoubted perpetration of atrocities in South Africa. I, therefore, asked this Question; and I hoped to receive an answer from the Colonial Secretary very different from the evasive and unsatisfactory answers he is in the habit of giving. ["Oh, oh!"] I do not make this a charge against the right hon. Baronet. I am disposed only to regard him in those matters relating to his Office as the channel of information in this House; but I regret to say that he is habitually the channel of most adulterated and misleading information. ["Oh, oh!"] Hon. Members have heard the manner in which I have been treated just now by the right hon. Gentleman. If a Member gets up and asks the right hon. Baronet a Question—for instance, whether Native women and children in South Africa are captured and indentured out into practical slavery—we receive the answer that no women or children in South Africa are treated in this way, or at all approaching it, except those who are deserted. I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to inform the House, in regard to the word "deserted," whether it is not an evasion perpetrated on the innocence of the right hon. Baronet, most unworthy of the traditions of the Public Service of the country? The alleged desertion—and I, and other Members on this side of the House, can prove it—is the desertion occasioned by driving off the male members of the tribe by bullet and bayonet. When the male members of the tribe are captured they are condemned to hard labour and penal servitude, and the Native women and children are then said to be deserted. It is for this House to judge whether that is a correct representation of the state of affairs. Not only have these poor women and children not been deserted by their natural supporters, but they have been deprived of them by the violence of Her Majesty's Administrator in South Africa. Again, Sir, if an hon. Member asks the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Colonies if it is true that prisoners of war, the tribesmen of Native Chiefs in South Africa, have, contrary to all the usages of civilization, been condemned to hard labour and penal servitude, the right hon. Baronet stands up in his place, and again—acting, no doubt, upon information which he has received—assures this House that no prisoners of war have been treated in any such manner. Sir, again, I am sorry to say, an evasion has been practised of the most culpable kind. These unfortunate tribesmen throughout South Africa are not, technically considered, prisoners of war; they have been tried for treason-felony, and under treason statutes, and are considered rebels and insurgents. I leave it to this House to say whether these tribesmen—ignorant, devoted to their Chiefs—who have followed those Chiefs into war against Her Majesty's Government, are not properly prisoners of war; and whether it is not unworthy even to speak of them as rebels punishable according to the ordinary law of the land? I have this year, and in previous years, asked Question upon Question of the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Colonies; and on every occasion, though I have never previously complained, I have had a right to complain of the uncourteous manner in which he replied. I repudiate with scorn and contempt any insinuation that I am not as careful of the honour of that Army—of which my countrymen form so distinguished a part—as any Member, I care not what his nationality may be, in this Empire. But I have duties to discharge to my conscience, to my Colleagues, to my constituents. Let the right hon. Baronet venture to disprove a single allegation that is made; but let him not presume to reply with unworthy taunts to a Member of this House who is acting in the discharge of his duty. I beg to move that this House do now adjourn.

MR. BIGGAR seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—
(Mr. O'Donnell.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I must again, Sir, enter my protest against this repetition of a practice which I ventured yesterday, or the day before, to say must, if persisted in, prove utterly destructive to the possibility of conducting Business regularly; and with a view to the convenience of the House, I think it unnecessary to take any special notice of the extraordinary language which the hon. Gentleman has chosen to indulge in. It is language approaching—though I do not say that it goes beyond an approach—to a very serious breach of the usual language of Parliament. I am quite sure that I speak the sentiments of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies, as well as my own and those of my Colleagues, in saying that we think very little of language such as that employed by the hon. Gentleman. I think that when the hon. Member talks of evasion, he is using language which my right hon. Friend may very well think it beneath him to take any notice of. I rise mainly for the purpose of again entering my protest against the introduction and the adoption by the House of a system of moving the adjournment of the House, in order to introduce matters for discussion that are not at all relevant to the Business before the House.

Mr. O'Donnell

MR. SULLIVAN: This heat is very much to be regretted; and I am astonished at the Chancellor of the Exchequer apparently forgetting who introduced it. Although loyalty to a Colleague is praiseworthy, there is a higher duty due from him. He is the Leader of this House, and ought to be the protector of the privileges of an independent Member; and if he found a Colleague, under momentary irritation, converting a reply to a Question into a harangue and an impeachment of a Member, then I say that the Leader of the House should have risen above the feelings of the Minister towards his Colleague. I must say I heard with astonishment—I will not say with astonishment, but with great pain—the tone and character of the reply of the Colonial Secretary. I correct myself in saying with astonishment, because, after all, we are all human. Still, official life does impose some restriction upon one's feelings; and, whatever the right hon. Baronet's irritation might have been, he was bound to consider that he was Her Majesty's public official, and that he filled a highly responsible position in this House, where gravity ought to characterize his language. Instead of replying in an official tone to a fair and legitimate Question, he introduced, not only matter of argument, but matter of invective; and what was his invective? It was an accusation that the hon. Member for Dungarvan had abused his position in this House. ["Hear, hear!"] Is there one man amongst those who are ready to say "Hear, hear!" who will have the courage to put his name to a Motion on the Paper that the hon. Member has abused his position? Let us watch the Notice Paper to see. If he has abused it, he is amenable to the Rules of the House. I regret this waste of time. Mark how, in the middle of June, when we ought to be proceeding with our Business, a Minister of the Crown, backed up by a loudly-cheering majority, wastes three-quarters of an hour of our time by getting up to lead us into a heated debate, instead of giving a courteous and proper answer to a fair Question. I will not go into other instances of this kind; but I charge upon Members of the Government this waste of public time. Let us hope that we shall have no more of these impeachments. I, for one, also complain of the language of the Colonial Secretary. He talked about our countrymen, and made imputations upon our countrymen in South Africa. He forgets, being a Colonial Secretary, that the paper which published the account was English. It was not an Irish newspaper, but The Tiverton Gazette, and the extract was copied into the London Echo, and the soldier who wrote that letter was an English soldier, you may be sure. ["No, no!"] Oh! there are a few English soldiers out in South Africa; although, when you wanted a man to lead them, you went to Ireland and found Sir Garnet Wolseley. This English soldier wrote as follows:—

"We found the day after the battle 500 wounded, most of them mortally, and begging us for mercy's sake not to kill them."

That is not a statement of the hon. Member for Dungarvan; it is not a statement of an Irish witness. It is a statement published by an English newspaper—

"Begging us for mercy's sake not to kill them; but they got no chance after what they had done to our comrades at Isandana."

["Divide, divide!"] Not so, Mr. Speaker. I am going to be heard. If anyone in this House sees a statement so serious as that, affecting the honour of your Army—[An hon. MEMBER: Prove it.] An hon. Member asks me to prove it. Take the statement out of an irresponsible public paper, bring it to the House, and then let the Minister give it a contradiction. If it is a slander—as I hope it may prove to be for the sake of our common humanity—let it be so branded; but the man who feels it his duty to call attention to it must not be received as my hon. Friend has been received; he must not be taunted and held up to scorn, and the Minister who does so cheered by Gentlemen sitting behind him. I do not wish to complain too much; but I beg to remind hon. Gentlemen opposite that we, too, have our feelings who sit on this side of the House: and we cannot see without protest an hon. Friend and Member treated—as we believe the hon. Member for Dungarvan has been treated—in such an unhandsome manner. I repeat my regret that this heated debate should have been provoked from the Treasury Bench, and I hope we shall be allowed to proceed with our Business.

Mr. NEWDEGATE remarked, that it was the deliberate opinion of the Select Committee on Public Business, over which the late Sir James Graham presided in 1861, that the present fashion of putting Questions might be made the vehicle for conveying imputations, the necessary reply to which would entail the frequent interruption of the Business of the House. It was in order to avoid such exhibitions as the House had now been made the scene of, that the arrangement was come to, that on going into Supply on Friday any subject might be raised which might be deemed worth the attention of the House. No abler Committee had ever been appointed than the Committee which framed that recommendation in order to avoid such scenes as had now occurred. For what had happened? A Member of the House had chosen, on the authority of a newspaper—or, it might be, two newspapers—to frame a Question in such terms as conveyed the grossest imputation upon our Army. When, in answer to that Question, the hon. Member was informed by the Secretary of State for the Colonies that if he had only consulted a newspaper, much more likely to attract public attention than those he had quoted, he might have known that inquiries were being instituted, and that it was impossible at present that his inquiries could be satisfactorily answered, the hon. Member treated that reply as an imputation—and he (Mr. Newdegate) thought the imputation well deserved; and then the hon. Member interrupted the Business of the House in order to make a vindication of his action, in which he had totally failed.

Mr. W. E. FORSTER: I hope that we shall be allowed very speedily to proceed to Business. I do not quite accept the rules for the conduct of our Business of my hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Newdegate). I think you, Sir, must be the judge whether a Question is in accordance with Order or not, and I must leave it to you to make that decision. Now, with regard to this Question, if it had stopped before the very last clause, I think the Government and the Colonial Secretary ought to have been glad that it was asked. These are two statements which are very distressing to anyone to read. The Government have done their duty in writing to be informed whether these and similar statements are true, thereby showing prind facie their disapproval; but I think it would have been rather a kindness to the Government, and rather a credit to the country, that the Colonial Secretary, or some other Member of the Government, should have been enabled by a Question to state officially that such a step had been taken. I think, however, that the hon. Gentleman went too far in his closing sentence. He seems by that to prejudice the case, which we all trust may turn out to be quite different to what he represented it. But when we come to the rebuke of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the hon. Gentleman for moving the adjournment of the House, I share the opinion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that these Motions for adjournment are exceedingly inconvenient; but I confess that in this particular case the Colonial Secretary ought almost to have anticipated the Motion. The way in which he answered the Question may or may not have been a just one, but he gave a strong rebuke to the hon. Member for the mode in which he asked it; and I think it is not unnatural to expect, that if a Member of the Government strongly rebukes in his reply to a Question a Member of this House for the form in which he has asked it, it is not unreasonable to expect that that Gentleman should get up and reply. I do hope that now we shall be allowed to proceed to Business.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I will only detain the House while I say one or two sentences in my own justification. Nothing that the hon. Member for Dungarvan can say in this House will provoke me to warmth on my own account; but I did feel, and I do feel, very deeply, the imputation which he appeared to me to cast upon men who were absent, and whom it seemed to be my duty to defend. I think that, at all events, I was so far justified, even upon the hon. Member's own showing; for by his reference to the Aborigines Protection Society it is clear that he had seen the letter to which I alluded. But, Sir, in moving the adjournment of the House the hon. Member went on to charge me—in language which I can well afford to pass by, I hope—with having answered former Questions in a way which he did not approve. He said that I had denied the existence of the practice of indenturing of women and children, or had explained it away in a manner which he considered evasive. But, Sir, I told the hon. Member, in my reply to that Question, that every information which I had received, or should receive, with reference to this practice of indenture—which I knew to be liable to abuse—had been, or should be, given to the House; and I told him also that I had made further inquiry as to what had actually happened in the matter. The hon. Member went on to say that I denied altogether that any persons who had been taken prisoners in the rebellion, or war in the Transkei, had been treated as convicts, and sent to penal servitude. My reply to the hon. Member—I recollect the exact words—was that I was not aware that anything of the kind had occurred; but there, again, I said I would make inquiries, and such inquiries have already been made, and the result, as soon as I receive it, shall be communicated to the House.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER wished humbly to suggest that the Motion made by the hon. Member for Dungarvan should not be allowed to be withdrawn, but should be met with a negative, and it would be then for the hon. Member to say whether he would test the opinion of the House on his conduct this afternoon.

MR. PARNELL: Repeatedly, Questions have been put to Ministers without the effect of eliciting any information whatever. All kinds of excuse are made. At one time the absence of telegraphic communication; at another time the highest State reasons are urged to deprive the House of any information. Now, Sir, when this Vote for the expenses of the Zulu War was brought before the House, I ventured to anticipate that a policy of extermination would be adopted in South Africa. I said I presumed that, as the Zulus had given no quarter at Isandlana, so no quarter would be given by the British troops to the Zulus in South Africa; but I was at once contradicted by several hon. Members behind the front Opposition Bench, who said that the utmost pains would be taken to secure that the operations of the troops should be continued in accordance with the usages of civilization, and that the conduct of the Zulus at Isandlana should not be imitated. I entered my protest against the war as the first Vote for Supply for the war—

MR. SPEAKER: If the hon. Member for Meath is referring to discussions which have arisen during this Session, he is not in Order.

MR. PARNELL: On several occasions, not in this House, I have felt it my duty to point out that, in all probability, the example of the Zulus at Isandlana would be imitated by Her Majesty's troops in South Africa; and I think the course of events has very fully justified my anticipations, and shown that, at all events, caution and forethought to avoid such occurrences was necessary on the part of Her Majesty's Government. But what have Her Majesty's Government done? We know that the Native auxiliaries are employed to aid the troops in South Africa. We know that those Native auxiliaries are not trained in the usages of war; and we have it on the authority of the different reports received that after the recent action at Ginghilova these Native auxiliaries did massacre these wounded Zulus in cold blood—and that these men were employed, not for the purpose of fighting or defending the trenches, but for the purpose of chasing and hounding down the Zulus after the battles. The Cavalry followed. ["Divide, divide!"] If hon. Gentlemen opposite do not consider that their good name and the good name of English soldiers in South Africa is worth anything, I consider that the suffering of these unfortunate Zulus is worth far more than all the trumpery Bills that have been introduced by Her Majesty's Government this Session. ["Divide!"] I shall not be deterred from pursuing the subject by any desire to proceed with the discussion of Government measures, which are entirely worthless in their character. Have we heard from the Secretary of State for the Colonies that he has taken any pains to prevent the recurrence of these things? And this is the example which is to be set to our troops! They pursue the flying enemy and massacre the wounded! Naturally, the young soldiers of England think they may do likewise, and they gratify their thirst for blood by following the example set by the Native troops. The conduct of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in particular, in endeavouring to thrust aside the matter at issue and attaching a charge of abusing the Forms of the House to the hon.

Member for Dungarvan, is very significant. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer were of opinion that the action of the troops in South Africa had been carried on according to the dictates of humanity, he would not have acted in any such manner; he would not have turned on the hon. Member for Dungarvan and attacked him in the manner he did for acting in a way which was perfectly in accordance with the Rules of this House, and which it was perfectly competent for him to adopt. When you make a war against a savage nation, it follows that your soldiers will also become more or less savage; and when they see their own countrymen massacred, it is almost impossible to restrain them; and, therefore, Her Majesty's Government should be careful not to enter into a war with a savage people unless compelled by the most urgent necessity to do so.

MR. O'DONNELL: Unless it is the wish of hon. Members, I have no desire to continue this discussion; but I think it is due both to the right hon. Baronet and myself that I should make this explanation. I beg to impress on the right hon. Baronet, that even if I had felt irritated by the manner in which he attacked me, I should have endeavoured to avoid any personal feeling. I distinctly declined to go further than to say that he was only the channel for evasion and imperfect information. As for his personal remarks, and for his supreme disdain for anything that a person like myself can say to him, that, Sir, is a piece of cheap scorn not to be imitated, I hope, by any Irish Member. I beg to ask the leave of the House to withdraw the Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

CRIMINAL LAW—CIRCULATION OF DISGUSTING LITERATURE.

QUESTION.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether any measures can be taken to suppress the hawking of disgusting and vicious literature, which has recently increased to such an extent in most frequented thoroughfares of London?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, there was no doubt that there had been a considerable distribution of these

tion of the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Colonies; and on every occasion, though I have never previously complained, I have had a right to complain of the uncourteous manner in which he replied. I repudiate with scorn and contempt any insinuation that I am not as careful of the honour of that Army—of which my countrymen form so distinguished a part—as any Member, I care not what his nationality may be, in this Empire. But I have duties to discharge to my conscience, to my Colleagues, to my constituents. Let the right hon. Baronet venture to disprove a single allegation that is made; but let him not presume to reply with unworthy taunts to a Member of this House who is acting in the discharge of his duty. I beg to move that this House do now adjourn.

MR. BIGGAR seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—
(Mr. O'Donnell.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I must again, Sir, enter my protest against this repetition of a practice which I ventured yesterday, or the day before, to say must, if persisted in, prove utterly destructive to the possibility of conducting Business regularly; and with a view to the convenience of the House, I think it unnecessary to take any special notice of the extraordinary language which the hon. Gentleman has chosen to indulge in. It is language approaching—though I do not say that it goes beyond an approach—to a very serious breach of the usual language of Parliament. I am quite sure that I speak the sentiments of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies, as well as my own and those of my Colleagues, in saying that we think very little of language such as that employed by the hon. Gentleman. I think that when the hon. Member talks of evasion, he is using language which my right hon. Friend may very well think it beneath him to take any notice of. I rise mainly for the purpose of again entering my protest against the introduction and the adoption by the House of a system of moving the adjournment of the House, in order to introduce matters for discussion that are not at all relevant to the Business before the House.

Mr. O'Donnell

MR. SULLIVAN: This heat is very much to be regretted; and I am astonished at the Chancellor of the Exchequer apparently forgetting who introduced it. Although loyalty to a Colleague is praiseworthy, there is a higher duty due from him. He is the Leader of this House, and ought to be the protector of the privileges of an independent Member; and if he found a Colleague, under momentary irritation, converting a reply to a Question into a harangue and an impeachment of a Member, then I say that the Leader of the House should have risen above the feelings of the Minister towards his Colleague. I must say I heard with astonishment—I will not say with astonishment, but with great pain—the tone and character of the reply of the Colonial Secretary. I correct myself in saying with astonishment, because, after all, we are all human. Still, official life does impose some restriction upon one's feelings; and whatever the right hon. Baronet's irritation might have been, he was bound to consider that he was Her Majesty's public officer, and that he filled a highly responsible position in this House, where gravity ought to characterize his language. Instead of replying in an official tone to a legitimate Question, he introduced not only matter of argument, but matter of invective; and what was his invective? It was an accusation that the hon. Member for Dungarvan had abused his position in this House. ["Hear, hear! Is there one man amongst those who are ready to say "Hear, hear!" who have the courage to put his name to Motion on the Paper that the hon. Member has abused his position?"] Let us watch the Notice Paper to see. If he has abused it, he is amenable to the Rules of the House. I regret a waste of time. Mark how, in the middle of June, when we ought to be proceeding with our Business, a Member of the Crown, backed up by a large cheering majority, wastes three-quarters of an hour of our time by getting us to lead us into a heated debate, instead of giving a courteous and proper answer to a fair Question. I will not go into other instances of this kind; but I charge upon Members of the Government this waste of public time. Let us hope that we shall have no more of these impeachments. I, for one, also complain of the language of the Colonial Secretary. He talked about our countrymen, and made imputations upon our countrymen in South Africa. He forgets, being a Colonial Secretary, that the paper which published the account was English. It was not an Irish newspaper, but The Tiverton Gazette, and the extract was copied into the London Echo, and the soldier who wrote that letter was an English soldier, you may be sure. ["No, no!"] Oh! there are a few English soldiers out in South Africa; although, when you wanted a man to lead them, you went to Ireland and found Sir Garnet Wolseley. This English soldier wrote as follows:—

"We found the day after the battle 500 wounded, most of them mortally, and begging us for mercy's sake not to kill them."

That is not a statement of the hon. Member for Dungarvan; it is not a statement of an Irish witness. It is a statement published by an English newspaper—

"Begging us for mercy's sake not to kill them; but they got no chance after what they had done to our comrades at Isandana."

ty ["Divide, divide!"] Not so, Mr. Speaker. I am going to be heard. If anyone in this House sees a statement so serious as that, affecting the honour of our Army—[An hon. MEMBER: Prove it.] An hon. Member asks me to prove it. Take the statement out of an responsible public paper, bring it to the House, and then let the Minister give it a contradiction. If it is a slander—as I hope it may prove to be for the sake of our common humanity—let it be so branded; but the man who feels it his duty to call attention to it must not be received as my hon. Friend has been received; he must not be taunted and held up to scorn, and the Minister who does so cheered by Gentlemen sitting behind him. I do not wish to complain too much; but I beg to remind hon. Gentlemen opposite that we, too, have our feelings who sit on this side of the House: and we cannot see without protest an hon. Friend and Member treated—as we believe the hon. Member for Dungarvan has been treated—in such an unbecomingly handsome manner. I repeat my regret that this heated debate should have been provoked from the Treasury Bench, and I hope we shall be allowed to proceed in our Business.

MR. NEWDEGATE remarked, that it was the deliberate opinion of the Select Committee on Public Business, over which the late Sir James Graham presided in 1861, that the present fashion of putting Questions might be made the vehicle for conveying imputations, the necessary reply to which would entail the frequent interruption of the Business of the House. It was in order to avoid such exhibitions as the House had now been made the scene of, that the arrangement was come to, that on going into Supply on Friday any subject might be raised which might be deemed worth the attention of the House. No abler Committee had ever been appointed than the Committee which framed that recommendation in order to avoid such scenes as had now occurred. For what had happened? A Member of the House had chosen, on the authority of a newspaper—or, it might be, two newspapers—to frame a Question in such terms as conveyed the grossest imputation upon our Army. When, in answer to that Question, the hon. Member was informed by the Secretary of State for the Colonies that if he had only consulted a newspaper, much more likely to attract public attention than those he had quoted, he might have known that inquiries were being instituted, and that it was impossible at present that his inquiries could be satisfactorily answered, the hon. Member treated that reply as an imputation—and he (Mr. Newdegate) thought the imputation well deserved; and then the hon. Member interrupted the Business of the House in order to make a vindication of his action, in which he had totally failed.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I hope that we shall be allowed very speedily to proceed to Business. I do not quite accept the rules for the conduct of our Business of my hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Newdegate). I think you, Sir, must be the judge whether a Question is in accordance with Order or not, and I must leave it to you to make that decision. Now, with regard to this Question, if it had stopped before the very last clause, I think the Government and the Colonial Secretary ought to have been glad that it was asked. These are two statements which are very distressing to anyone to read. The Government have done their duty in writing to be informed whether these and similar statements are true, thereby showing prima facie their disapproval; but I think it would have been rather a kindness to the Government, and rather a credit to the country, that the Colonial Secretary, or some other Member of the Government, should have been enabled by a Question to state officially that such a step had been taken. I think, however, that the hon. Gentleman went too far in his closing sentence. He seems by that to prejudice the case, which we all trust may turn out to be quite different to what he represented it. But when we come to the rebuke of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the hon. Gentleman for moving the adjournment of the House, I share the opinion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that these Motions for adjournment are exceedingly inconvenient; but I confess that in this particular case the Colonial Secretary ought almost to have anticipated the Motion. The way in which he answered the Question may or may not have been a just one, but he gave a strong rebuke to the hon. Member for the mode in which he asked it; and I think it is not unnatural to expect, that if a Member of the Government strongly rebukes in his reply to a Question a Member of this House for the form in which he has asked it, it is not unreasonable to expect that that Gentleman should get up and reply. I do hope that now we shall be allowed to proceed to Business.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I will only detain the House while I say one or two sentences in my own justification. Nothing that the hon. Member for Dungarvan can say in this House will provoke me to warmth on my own account; but I did feel, and I do feel, very deeply, the imputation which he appeared to me to cast upon men who were absent, and whom it seemed to be my duty to defend. I think that, at all events, I was so far justified, even upon the hon. Member's own showing; for by his reference to the Aborigines Protection Society it is clear that he had seen the letter to which I alluded. But, Sir, in moving the adjournment of the House the hon. Member went on to charge me—in language which I can well afford to pass by, I hope—with having answered former Questions in a way which he did not approve. He said that I had denied the existence of the practice of indenturing of women and children, or had explained it away in a manner which he considered evasive. But, Sir, I told the hon. Member, in my reply to that Question, that every information which I had received, or should receive, with reference to this practice of indenture—which I knew to be liable to abuse—had been, or should be, given to the House; and I told him also that I had made further inquiry as to what had actually happened in the matter. The hon. Member went on to say that I denied altogether that any persons who had been taken prisoners in the rebellion, or war in the Transkei, had been treated as convicts, and sent to penal servitude. My reply to the hon. Member—I recollect the exact words—was that I was not aware that anything of the kind had occurred; but there, again, I said I would make inquiries, and such inquiries have already been made, and the result, as soon as I receive it, shall be communicated to the House.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER wished humbly to suggest that the Motion made by the hon. Member for Dungarvan should not be allowed to be withdrawn, but should be met with a negative, and it would be then for the hon. Member to say whether he would test the opinion of the House on his conduct this afternoon.

MR. PARNELL: Repeatedly, Questions have been put to Ministers without the effect of eliciting any information whatever. All kinds of excuse are made. At one time the absence of telegraphic communication; at another time the highest State reasons are urged to deprive the House of any information. Now, Sir, when this Vote for the expenses of the Zulu War was brought before the House, I ventured to anticipate that a policy of extermination would be adopted in South Africa. I said I presumed that, as the Zulus had given no quarter at Isandlana, so no quarter would be given by the British troops to the Zulus in South Africa; but I was at once contradicted by several hon. Members behind the front Opposition Bench, who said that the utmost pains would be taken to secure that the operations of the troops should be continued in accordance with the usages of civilization, and that the conduct of the Zulus at Isandlana should not be imitated. I entered my protest against the war as the first Vote for Supply for the war—

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. Member for Meath is referring to discussions which have arisen during this Session, he is not in Order.

Mr. PARNELL: On several occasions, not in this House, I have felt it my duty to point out that, in all probability, the example of the Zulus at Isandlana would be imitated by Her Majesty's troops in South Africa; and I think the course of events has very fully justified my anticipations, and shown that, at all events, caution and forethought to avoid such occurrences was necessary on the part of Her Majesty's Government. But what have Her Majesty's Government done? We know that the Native auxiliaries are employed to aid the troops in South Africa. We know that those Native auxiliaries are not trained in the usages of war; and we have it on the authority of the different reports received that after the recent action at Ginghilova these Native auxiliaries did massacre these wounded Zulus in cold blood—and that these men were employed, not for the purpose of fighting or defending the trenches, but for the purpose of chasing and hounding down the Zulus after the battles. The Cavalry followed. ["Divide, divide!"] If hon. Gentlemen opposite do not consider that their good name and the good name of English soldiers in South Africa is worth anything, I consider that the suffering of these unfortunate Zulus is worth far more than all the trumpery Bills that have been introduced by Her Majesty's Government this Session. ["Divide!"] I shall not be deterred from pursuing the subject by any desire to proceed with the discussion of Government measures, which are entirely worthless in their character. Have we heard from the Secretary of State for the Colonies that he has taken any pains to prevent the recurrence of these things? And this is the example which is to be set to our troops! They pursue the flying enemy and massacre the wounded! Naturally, the young soldiers of England think they may do likewise, and they gratify their thirst for blood by following the example set by the Native troops. The conduct of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in particular, in endeavouring to thrust aside the matter at issue and attaching a charge of abusing the Forms of the House to the hon.

Member for Dungarvan, is very significant. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer were of opinion that the action of the troops in South Africa had been carried on according to the dictates of humanity, he would not have acted in any such manner; he would not have turned on the hon. Member for Dungarvan and attacked him in the manner he did for acting in a way which was perfectly in accordance with the Rules of this House, and which it was perfectly competent for him to adopt. When you make a war against a savage nation, it follows that your soldiers will also become more or less savage; and when they see their own countrymen massacred, it is almost impossible to restrain them; and, therefore, Her Majesty's Government should be careful not to enter into a war with a savage people unless compelled by the most urgent necessity to do so.

Mr. O'DONNELL: Unless it is the wish of hon. Members, I have no desire to continue this discussion; but I think it is due both to the right hon. Baronet and myself that I should make this explanation. I beg to impress on the right hon. Baronet, that even if I had felt irritated by the manner in which he attacked me, I should have endeavoured to avoid any personal feeling. I distinctly declined to go further than to say that he was only the channel for evasion and imperfect information. As for his personal remarks, and for his supreme disdain for anything that a person like myself can say to him, that, Sir, is a piece of cheap scorn not to be imitated, I hope, by any Irish Member. I beg to ask the leave of the House to withdraw the Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

CRIMINAL LAW—CIRCULATION OF DISGUSTING LITERATURE.

QUESTION.

Mr. O'DONNELL asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department. Whether any measures can be taken to suppress the hawking of disgusting and vicious literature, which has recently increased to such an extent in most frequented thoroughfares of London?

Mr. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, there was no doubt that there had been a considerable distribution of these papers, and he should be extremely glad to see them stopped. The attention of the police had been directed to the matter; but the legal adviser of the police informed him that the papers which had been forwarded to him by the hon. Member for Dungarvan were not such as to bring them within their powers so as to prevent the circulation. At the same time, the police would do all they could to stop the circulation of these papers. He would remind hon. Members, however, although they might wish to stop what was wrong, that literature of the kind complained of very often died a natural death, unless by certain prosecutions it had been made notorious.

CRIMINAL CODE (INDICTABLE OFFENCES) BILL—REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONERS.—QUESTION.

SIR HENRY JAMES asked Mr. Attorney General, When the Report of the Commissioners on the Criminal Code (Indictable Offences) Bill will be presented to Parliament; and, if the Government will allow a reasonable time for considering such Report before proceeding with that Bill?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER): The Report of the Commissioners on the Criminal Code (Indictable Offences) Bill is now ready, and will be placed in the hands of Members directly. No doubt, reasonable time will be allowed to Members to consider it before the Bill is proceeded with.

DEBTORS ACT (1869) AMENDMENT BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. M. T. BASS asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether the Debtors Act (1869) Amendment Bill will be proceeded with this Session; and, if so, whether the Government will propose, or accept, if proposed, the insertion of a Clause in such Bill abolishing imprisonment for debt?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER): The question of whether the Bill will be proceeded with this Session will depend on whether the Bankruptcy Law Amendment Bill can be passed through the House. At present, the prospect of making progress with these measures seems somewhat remote. I am not in a position to say whether the Government would consent to repeal section 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, which I presume is what is meant by the expression in the Question "abolishing imprisonment for debt." A proposition to repeal this section would, however, in my view, be well worthy of careful consideration; and, I have no doubt, would receive such consideration from the Government.

UNREFORMED MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—REPORT OF THE COMMISSION.—QUESTION.

MR. WHITWELL asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the Report of the Commission for inquiring into Unreformed Municipal Corporations is likely soon to be laid upon the Table of the House?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, the Report had unfortunately been delayed by the serious illness of the Chairman of the Commission (Mr. Stephen Cave). His right hon. Friend, however, had now returned to England, and, no doubt, the matter would be proceeded with.

POST OFFICE—MAIL CONTRACT WITH THE PENINSULAR AND ORIENTAL STEAM COMPANY.—QUESTION.

MR. J. HOLMS asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If he can inform the House when the Mail Contract with the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Company will be submitted to the consideration of the House?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in reply, said, he had been anxious to submit the Mail Contract in question to the consideration of the House; but, in the present state of Public Business, he could not undertake to say when he would be enabled to do so. Certainly, however, he would give, at least, three days' notice before taking the opinion of the House on the subject.

FRANCE—DEMONETISATION OF SILVER.—QUESTION.

MR. ERRINGTON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether there is any reason to apprehend that, as stated in the "Times" Paris Correspondence of June the 11th, that the French Government intend to follow up the partial demonetisation of silver in the Island of La Réunion, by demonetising it "on a vast scale" in France and other portions of the French dominions?

Mr. Assheton Cross

MR. BOURKE: We have heard nothing at all from the French Government on the subject.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—
SIR GARNET WOLSELEY'S INSTRUCTIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. PARNELL asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the Government will now communicate to the House the instructions given to Sir Garnet Wolseley?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Her Majesty's Government do not consider that it would be expedient at the present moment to publish these instructions.

ARTIZANS' DWELLINGS ACT, 1868—
PRIVATE BURYING GROUNDS.

QUESTION.

MR. WADDY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been directed to the Report made by the Medical Officer of Health of Islington, on the 16th of March, 1877, and to the fact that a portion of the site of a burial-ground there is being covered with dwellings occupied by working men and their families under conditions that are dangerous to health; whether, as stated in a further Report on the 7th of June last, it is correct that the foundations are not deeper than one foot, that then the workmen came to bones and decomposed matter; that the houses near are rendered unsafe by the instability of the subsoil; that the houses have no proper and efficient drainage; and that the state of the ground is calculated to produce pestilence; and, whether, under these circumstances, the Home Secretary will do anything to prevent these houses being occupied?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: It was my desire some time ago to make an order for closing the burial-ground in question, and for planting it, as in other places; but I found, on inquiry, that it was absolutely impossible for me to do so. The same proceeding was attempted by one of my Predecessors, Sir George Grey; but the Law Officers of the Crown advised him that he had no power to take such action. It is a pity that the Vestry authorities did not indict the owner of the site of the burial-ground, or the builder, when they were proceeding with this work, if the facts of the case are as stated by the hon. and learned Member. and I do not cast the slightest imputation upon their accuracy. I have ordered a special Report to be made by the Inspector of Burial Grounds; and if I can take any action in the matter I shall do so. I cannot conceive anything more injurious or more scandalous.

PARLIAMENT — ARRANGEMENT OF BUSINESS—MORNING SITTINGS.

QUESTIONS.

In reply to MR. FAWCETT,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said: I hope it may be found possible to proceed with the East India Loan (Consolidated Fund) Bill this evening; but, if not, I will make the best arrangement I can. It would, however, necessarily be some time before we could find a day for it.

MR. CHILDERS wished to know whether there would be a Morning Sitting to-morrow?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: It is not proposed to have a Morning Sitting to-morrow. I intend next week to ask for Morning Sittings both on Tuesdays and on Fridays. It is becoming of great importance that we should proceed with the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill, and therefore I propose on Monday to take Supply, probably the Army Estimates; and on Tuesday, Thursday, and again on Friday morning, we shall proceed with the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill. It is becoming essential, looking to the time when the other Act expires, that we should make progress with it.

MR. RYLANDS asked, Whether it was proposed to have Morning Sittings every Friday for the rest of the Session?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I cannot answer the Question off-hand; but a great deal will depend upon the progress made with the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill.

MR. CHILDERS asked, Whether any Votes would be taken in Committee of Supply to-morrow?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Supply will be put down on the Paper; but we do not propose to take any Votes. We shall proceed with the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill, and any other Business there may be.

EAST INDIA REVENUE ACCOUNTS.

PETITIONS PRESENTED.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT: I have to present to the House a series of Petitions, signed entirely, I believe, by Natives of India. The Petitions are some six in number. One is from Native inhabitants of Ahmedabad, in the Presidency of Bombay; one is from the Punjab; one from the North-West Provinces and Oude; one from the Province of Assam; one from Central India; and one from the Province of Bengal. I am assured that the signatures amount in all to 10,000. The Petitions are alike in statement and in prayer. They bring before the House the fact that many promises have been made to the Natives of India that they should be accepted, not into the ordinary, but into the covenanted Service; and they say that these promises have been almost altogether unfulfilled. Without going into detail I will, with the permission of the House, conclude by reading the prayer. It is—“That the maximum limit of age for admission to the open competition examination for the Civil Service of India be raised to 22 years”

—for reasons that are stated in the Petition. And, further, says the prayer—

“That the open competition examination for the Civil Service of India be held simultaneously with that in London, in some centre or centres in India where a definite proportion of appointments, such as may be determined upon by your honourable House, may be competed for year after year.”

The Petition gives strong, and I should say abundant, reasons for the fairness of the proposition which the Petitioners make to the House. I shall be glad to move, if I am in Order, that one of the Petitions be printed with the Votes.

MR. SPEAKER: According to the ordinary course, when a Petition is referred to the Select Committee on Petitions, it rests with them to determine whether it should be printed.

MR. GLADSTONE: I have to present a Petition, signed by British-born and Indian subjects residing in Calcutta and in the neighbourhood of Calcutta, similar to one presented by me some time ago from another quarter. This Petition relates in particular to the expenses of the Afghan War, and to the repeal of the duty on certain descriptions of cotton goods. The prayer is that the House will direct that India be relieved from any further share in the payment of the cost of the Afghan War; and that the House will also condemn the Order of the Government of India exempting certain cotton goods from payment of import duty. The Petition consists of very careful and, I think, able reasoning, or series of statements, in support of those propositions.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

INDIA — EAST INDIA REVENUE ACCOUNTS—THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT.—COMMITTEE.

ADJOURNED DEBATE. [THIRD NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [22nd May], “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair” (for Committee upon East India Revenue Accounts).

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. J. K. CROSS said, it might, perhaps, be convenient to the House to direct their attention to the point at which this debate had arrived when it was adjourned a fortnight ago; and he would do so, because it would be within the recollection of many hon. Gentlemen that they had not been present since the Under Secretary of State for India had made his very able Statement, and, therefore, they probably had not followed the course of the debate. Most of the speeches made had been addressed rather to general Indian questions than to protests against, or criticisms upon, the speech of the Under Secretary; indeed, with the exception of protests against the remission of the cotton duties by the hon. Members for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), Plymouth (Mr. Sampson Lloyd), and Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell), and against the great reduction in Public Works expenditure by the hon. Members for Hackney and Kirkcaldy, there had been a somewhat dangerous agreement in favour of the Government proposals. Why his hon. Friend the Member for Kirkcaldy should, in denouncing the

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

Government for their action on the cotton duties, have turned the battery of his indignation upon him (Mr. J. K. Cross) he could not conceive, unless it was that he happened to be the one Liberal Member present. Really, he assured him that he was not answerable for the Government's action in this matter, and he dared say that they would not care that he should say a word in their defence; but, really, his hon. Friends, who were so anxious that India should be lightly taxed, must be aware that those who would be the gainers by that remission were the poorest of the people in India; for it was they who bought the common goods, on which the duties were remitted; and he could not understand how they could be aggrieved by having the few square yards of common shirting on which their respectability somewhat depended at a lower price than formerly. Another point of great interest raised in the debate was the question of exchange, which the hon. Member for Plymouth would rectify by universal bi-metallism, and which his hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge (Mr. Sidebottom) would remedy by a bi-metallic currency, failing which he thought the Loan Bill the next best way of rehabilitating silver—a monstrous long word, which meant, so far as India was concerned, screwing up the price of the rupee. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe) would regenerate India by giving her a paper standard of value based upon an ideal redemption in gold—a redemption seemingly, at least, as ideal as anything that ever perplexed the brain of the most bewildered student of metaphysics, and which would require a fuller revelation than that vouchsafed by the right hon. Gentleman before they could accept it. So far as he understood his proposition, it seemed to be ably answered by the noble Lord the Vice President of the Council (Lord George Hamilton), who also clearly pointed out that the nominal loss on exchange greatly exceeded the real loss, which could not be estimated at more than £2,750,000 sterling. The Under Secretary of State had begun his eloquent and exceedingly able speech so pleasantly, that it was a long time before they discovered how grave was the statement he was making; but before he had finished, they had certainly come to the conclusion that he had laid before the House by far the gravest official Statement as to Indian Finance that had been put before Parliament since the Government of India had been transferred from the Company to the Crown; and so great was the contrast between his speech and those which had so often been heard from his Predecessors, that they might be excused for believing either that on that occasion the hon. Gentleman had painted far too gloomy a financial landscape for their contemplation, or that his Predecessor had been in an equal degree too sanguine. But now, having that grave statement before them, they might accept it as an official notice that we were no longer to look upon Indian finance through the glamour of Eastern romance. We had dismissed fiction, and taken fact into our service. He would examine the teaching of fact respecting the Accounts of the year 1877-8. At paragraph 32 of the East India Finance Accounts for 1877-8 he found what was called the true result, which was as follows:—

“The whole true excess Expenditure of the year becomes £9,266,179, or, more correctly, 9,26,61,790 rupees, which is the measure of the increase of the Public Debt during the year.”

At paragraph 33, we have the following:—

“Of this large sum, £4,968,123 is due to the construction of Productive Public Works, in pursuance of the policy deliberately adopted. The Famine affected the Accounts of 1877-8 adversely by £6,500,000. If this Estimate is correct, it follows that, but for the Famine, the Revenue Accounts of 1877-8 would have shown a surplus of about £2,201,944. Provided that the works upon which the excluded £4,968,123 was spent could be trusted to be truly reproductive, this result might be regarded as very satisfactory.”

But at the foot of the page there appeared an explanatory paragraph, stating that the Public Works productive expenditure included £177,071 for loss of exchange. That could no more be reckoned as profit or invested capital, than a London merchant, having made a bad debt of £177,071, could add it to his stock at the end of the year as part of his capital. At paragraph 37, they had what was called the “final conclusion,” which ran thus—

“This, then, is the out-turn of the finances of 1877-8. If the Famine, costing £6,500,000, and the expenditure on productive Public Works, amounting to £4,968,123, be eliminated, there remains a surplus of £2,201,944. But for the measures to which reference has been made, this surplus would have been smaller by £461,276, or, in all, £1,740,668. On the other hand, it has to be remembered that a portion of the productive Public Works, costing £1,670,930, is expected (however useful the works may otherwise be) to yield, for a long time to come, only small interest."

[Third Night.]

Taking the "true result" and "final conclusion" together, they found that from the nominal surplus of £2,201,944 there required to be deducted for Famine £6,500,000. Productive Works expenditure, which should have gone to Public Works ordinary, £1,670,930, and loss by exchange, £177,071, together, £8,348,001, leaving a net deficit for 1877-8 of £6,146,057, in place of a nominal surplus of £2,201,944. He would not go further into finance accounts; the later years were in the womb of the future, and it was ill speculating on the complexion or features of the unborn; but he would like to ask the House to consider three of the proposals of the hon. Gentleman—namely, the great reduction proposed in Public Works expenditure, both ordinary and productive; the policy of borrowing in India at a much higher rate than that at which the money could be obtained in England; and the policy of the Loan Bill, involving the consideration of the Government controlling the exchanges. Now, the proposal with regard to the Public Works expenditure was that it should be reduced by £750,000, and that Public Works productive should be limited to £2,500,000. The expenditure under both these heads would then be—for Public Works ordinary about £4,000,000, and for Public Works productive, £2,500,000; making a total of £6,500,000, against the present total of £9,330,647, or a reduction of £2,830,647. He did not see how such a reduction as that could be effected in one year.

MR. E. STANHOPE explained, that he had stated that the reduction could not be made at once. In the present year it would only be £1,000,000, and it would take some time before the whole reduction could be effected.

MR. J. K. CROSS said, he was glad that he had elicited that explanation; but he wished to point out that this was a very startling proposal, and it involved very grave considerations. It was a reduction of no less than 30 per cent, and it was an open question whether it was possible to effect so great a change. The Departmental expenses were now over £2,000,000 a-year; could they be reduced by £600,000? There were at present 1,100 civil engineers in India, at salaries averaging £600 each, or a total expenditure on that head alone of £660,000. Could they reduce that item of expense by so large a sum as £198,000 in any reasonable time? If they could not reduce the Establishment charges in proportion to the total reduction, the works undertaken would cost even more in proportion than they cost now, and at present the supervision charges were a monstrous abuse, costing, as they did, at least 23 per cent on the work done. But there was a very grave political question involved, for the reduction meant the discharge of a vast army of workmen who for years had been engaged in the Government service. Had the Government any idea of the number of men they were going to cast loose upon the face of the country, and who would have no occupation? If £1,000,000 out of the £2,800,000 saved was withheld from the wage-earners, at least 130,000 would have to be discharged, and no one could contemplate that state of affairs without grave misgivings. The advantages of borrowing in India, instead of in England, were supposed to be two-fold—political and financial. It was for the political advantage of the Government that the Indian Debt should be held by Indians; and it was a financial advantage that the interest should not come into the exchange market for remittance to England; there was also the advantage of the interest and principal being payable in silver. If the Government was assured that it had secured these advantages, it might not be bad finance to pay a higher rate for money in India than it would have to pay in England. But he ventured to assert that in the Loan issued in India, the Government did not know that it had secured either of the two first advantages, and it had paid an enormous price for the third. 40,000,000 rupees had been borrowed at $4\frac{1}{2}$, the subscription price being $94\frac{3}{4}$; the product was 37,900,000 rupees; the annual interest 1,800,000 rupees. If this Loan had been issued in England, the same amount would have been realized (reckoning the rupee at 1s. 7d.) by a loan of £3,000,400; the annual interest, at 4 per cent, would have been £120,016, which, at 1s. 7d. per rupee, would have been placed in London by a sale of 1,516,000 rupees, or a less annual charge on India by 284,000 rupees than that incurred by the Government. This difference of charge, accumulating at compound interest, would repay the Loan at maturity, and it did seem to him to be at least a very doubtful piece of finance. He now came to the policy of controlling the exchanges involved in the consideration of the Loan Bill. There seemed to be a strong opinion among many Members of the House that it would be a great advantage to India if exchange and silver were to rise greatly in price. Many people outside the House of Commons seemed to think that India was about to be ruined by cheap silver, and that seemed to him to be such an extraordinary delusion that he would ask permission of the House to say a word or two upon the subject. First let him say a word about the question in gross, and then consider it in detail. India had in bygone years absorbed vast quantities of silver, and had given her products in exchange for that metal. For 20 years, ending in 1875, she had absorbed some 32,000,000 oz. a-year, and had given £8,000,000 of her products in exchange for it. Would she have been poorer if she had obtained 40,000,000 oz. of silver annually in exchange for her £8,000,000 worth of produce? If she were an exporter of silver, she might gain by its advance; but as she still bought more than she sold, it surely could not be a great disadvantage to her that the commodity she bought should be cheap. But let them consider the question in detail. The Madrassee rice-grower who owed taxes or interest sold his rice to enable him to pay those taxes or that interest and he now took his 40 lbs. of rice, exchanged it for the rupee, and, so far as the rupee would go, he discharged his debt. Screw up the price of the rupee by 10 per cent, give it a greater purchasing power, and he would have to take 44 lbs. of rice to exchange for the rupee; but surely, by so doing, he would not be richer. Again, the cotton-grower in Bombay or Bengal now scraped together 5 lbs. of the worst cotton he could find and exchanged it for the rupee, with which he paid his indebtedness as far as he could; but would he be better off if he had to take 5½ lbs. of cotton to do that work? Let them apply this principle at home, and see how it would work. The Prime Minister, a little while ago, made a speech attributing some of the evils of the farmers to the appreciation of gold; he described how its enhanced purchasing power compelled the farmer to give more of his produce for it, and so impoverished him; and he described the evil vividly, as was his wont. But if a rise in the standard of value in England was bad for us, could a fall in the standard of value in India be ruin to India? That it seriously affected the Government was visible to anyone, and it would be well to consider the position of the Indian Government in this matter. They had a dual duty to perform—they had to govern India, and to sell silver. In their functions as a Government it was their duty to render the rupee, the medium in which taxation was paid, as easy of acquisition by the people as possible. As sellers of silver their duty was to get the highest price they could for it. Those functions were hardly compatible, and, no doubt, were hard to fulfil. The Government raised 500,000,000 rupees of taxes in India, and they had to sell 200,000,000 rupees of that to provide home remittances. If the rupee were screwed up 10 per cent, the Government, as silver merchants, saved 20,000,000 rupees; but the whole 500,000,000 rupees was harder by 10 per cent for the taxpayer to lay hold of. He had to part with more of his substance for it, and the taxation of India would be practically increased by 50,000,000 rupees. Was it worth while for the Government to tax India 50,000,000 rupees more in order to save 20,000,000 rupees on exchange? Then there was the opium sale; the price of opium must rise as silver depreciated. Indeed, the measure of the depreciation in silver should be the rise in opium, and if the opium sales equalled the silver sales, one should balance the other. But as the opium sales were only 100,000,000 rupees, and the silver sales were double that amount, the Government could only gain on opium half what it lost on silver; but that it must gain in proportion to its opium sales was certain, if silver had really depreciated equally with exchange. Those things took some time to settle, for commodities did not quickly follow exchange fluctuations; but in the long run they were certain to do so. Now, if the Loan Bill was not intended to enable the Government to hold back silver when the market price seemed to them to be too low, the Bill had no meaning. The only excuse for the Loan Bill was the difficulty of selling exchange, which was really selling silver. As silver merchants, the Government were quite right in holding their silver, provided they thought it certain to rise. But before they asked the House to endorse a loan for that purpose they were bound to put before the House a careful forecast, showing the whole position as clearly as possible. They should tell them what silver they would have to sell for the next two or three years; they should endeavour to estimate what silver would come into the market against them; and, above all, they should make an estimate of what India would be able to absorb during the next few years, for on that he ventured to say the price of silver mainly depended. It was now three years since that question was prominently before the House, and he would endeavour very shortly to put one or two considerations concerning it before hon. Members. When the Silver Committee reported in 1876, they found three primary and three secondary reasons for the fall in silver. They were—first, the discovery of mines of exceeding richness in America; second, the demonetization of silver by Germany; third, the diminution of the Indian demand; fourth, the change of the standard of value in the Scandinavian Kingdoms from silver to gold; fifth, the stoppage of the free mintage of silver by France, and the limitation of the coinage by the countries of the Latin Union; and sixth, the expectant attitude of Holland, she having stopped the coinage of silver and adopted a gold coinage. In considering the case now, we might eliminate from the list the Scandinavian cause, because its action had passed by, and the Dutch cause, Holland now having adopted a gold standard, though still preserving silver as a legal tender. We should have four causes left, the American, the German, the French, and the Indian, which he proposed shortly to examine in the order in which he had named them. The American cause, which was considered very important, proved to have been exaggerated. Hon. Members would recollect the sensation created when we heard of pyramids of silver awaiting a market, and an outpour of £14,000,000 to £20,000,000 was feared. On reference to No. 9 of the Consular Reports for 1878, he found the following, which rather disposed of that exaggerated view:—

Mr. J. K. Cross

Mr. J. K. Cross

“It appears from the minutes on the production of silver in the United States that it is very much less than the financial world believed. Instead of producing silver to the amount of £20,000,000 a-year, the United States have in six years only produced £31,120,000, or an annual produce of £5,200,000.”

And in confirmation he would quote a statement which seemed to be authentic, taken from The Economist of the 26th April—

“That investigations made by the American Government concerning the product of the precious metals on the Pacific coast disclose the fact that the estimates made both by the Wells, Fargo “Express,” and by the Director of the United States Mint, are excessive.”

This statement also showed that the product had risen to £7,636,000 in 1876; but that it was estimated at only £5,000,000 in 1879. He might also state that the import of silver into this country from the United States was £19,300,000 in four years ending 1874, and only £9,000,000 in the four years ending 1878. He asked the House to conclude that the American cause was not, and had not been, a factor in the European depression of silver. But at some not very distant future time, when America should have supplied her currency requirements, the American production would again require a market in Europe, and should the Eastern absorbing power not return the price might be seriously affected. The German demonetization appeared to be almost accomplished. It had been estimated that in 1876, out of a total amount of silver supposed to be in circulation in 1871 of £59,000,000, there would be required for subsidiary coinage, £21,500,000; already sold, £6,000,000; remaining, £31,500,000. And from what he could learn from the first bullion brokers in the City, the total now sold by the German Government amounted to about £32,000,000, which was confirmed by a statement in The Economist of the 24th of May, taken from a Report to the German Reichstag, accounting for £52,600,000, by saying that £19,200,000 had been recoined, and that £33,400,000 had been melted down and sold. It appeared, then, that there could not be much more silver to come from Germany. The amount sold by Germany was certainly large, and he had been unable to trace the destination of this large amount; but, had India maintained her old absorbing power, this £33,000,000 sold during the six or seven years could not have materially affected prices unless other causes had been at work. Perhaps we might consider the German cause as passing away and almost spent. The French cause—the stoppage of the free mintage of silver—could not in itself be considered a cause of depression, though it did become a depressing cause when any surplus silver was on the market. Hon. Members were aware that for the whole of this century France had held open her Mint for the free coinage of either gold or silver, and that anyone who took to that Mint 1 cwt. of gold or 15½ cwt. of silver would get the same amount in notes. The existence of this bi-metallic monetary equilibrium value practically regulated the relative value of gold and silver throughout the commercial world, and as long as it existed it mattered little to merchants whether their balances came to hand in silver or in gold, in the relative proportion of 15½ oz. of silver for one of gold. They always could convert the one into the other at the French Mint. That that was a great convenience to gold countries trading with silver countries, and vice versa, no one would deny; and, however they might hold to one metallic standard, there was no doubt that during the time that this bi-metallic value was open exchanges between silver countries and gold countries were wonderfully steady. But immediately this value was closed any little surplus silver ran about looking for some place to hide in, and if a buyer did not appear at the moment, the price fell. He might state that at the beginning of this century the production of silver was 46½ oz. to a production of 1 oz. of gold, and that in 1852 the production of silver was only 4 oz. to 1 oz. of gold; yet the variation in the relative prices of these metals was not more than 4½ per cent during 70 years, whilst since the closing of this bi-metallic value the fluctuations in 10 days exceeded the previous fluctuations in 70 years. So, if India had maintained her absorbing power, that cause would not have depressed silver. This cause would seem to be rather a removal of the regulating power than a cause of depression in itself, and would leave the future of silver in Europe to be settled by the demand at the moment. He next came to the fourth cause, the stoppage of India's absorbing power. During the last 39 years she had absorbed £315,000,000 of bullion, mostly silver. In 20 years ending in 1875 she had absorbed £86,692,000 gold and £162,602,000 silver, or together, £249,294,000. In those years she had taken all the silver the world produced, and would have taken more if it had been obtainable, and the remainder of her balances had to be settled in gold. But since 1869 there had been a great diminution in her absorbing power. Thus the amount of specie absorbed in the two years ending 1857 was £23,846,000; in the four years ending 1861, £52,149,000; in the next four years to 1865, £75,280,000; from 1865 to 1869, £59,160,000; from that year to 1873, £29,948,000; and from the last period to the year 1877, £20,910,000. In the first 14 years of this period of 22 years India absorbed £210,000,000 specie, or at the rate of £15,000,000 a-year; but that in the last 8 years—including 1877—she had only absorbed £6,300,000 a-year. They should try to find out why India could not absorb in the way she did a few years ago, and it was only when hon. Members came to look into the finance accounts that they would find the reason clearly written. They would find there that the Home charges were going on increasing year by year. In 1868, it required only 84,970,000 rupees to satisfy the English or Home indebtedness; but, in 1879, it required 189,000,000 rupees. This was a monstrous increase. It was perfectly impossible that India could stand it and keep above water, and it was necessary the country should look into this matter as soon as possible. What was the cause of it? That seemed to be the difficulty. India sent us a very large quantity of surplus products. She sent us nearly £20,000,000 a-year more than we send her in merchandize. Where India would take, had she her own way, her returns in silver, salt, and shirtings, we forced her to take all kinds of things that she did not want. We made her take expensive soldiers, and still more expensive civilians; and we made her pay for absentee soldiers—for soldiers who never went near her. He was not blaming any particular Government. He had shown that in 1868 the Home payments amounted to a sum equal to 43½ per cent of the land revenue, and that in 1879 they required a sum equal to the whole net land revenue. This showed an increase of annual charge upon India of 104,000,000 rupees in 11 years. The evidence of Indian officials showed how some of this increased charge arose. Men of great distinction were examined before the India Finance Committee in 1873, and they gave very telling evidence. In reply to a question, General Pears said—

“Every regiment in India has its colonel, usually a general officer, not an effective officer with the regiment, but at home. We pay that, as he belongs to, and is a member of, a regiment serving in India.”

So that colonels did not appear to be with their regiments in India, but in London, though India had to pay for their services. Then, as to the cost of recruits, General Pears said that under the Company it was £42 per head, whereas now it was £82 per head. The hon. Member for Hackney asked the same witness the following question:—

“According to the figures you have just given, one-fourth of all the officers belonging to the Indian Army, for whom India is paying, are in England?” The reply was—“Yes, I think that would not be very far from the mark.”

On the same subject, Sir John Strachey, an Indian official whose opinions were entitled to great weight, had ended a strong protest against the existing system, by urging that it was the duty of the Government of India, by economizing, to provide for the charges that became due on account of Military Services in the country. He had made various suggestions to the House in regard to Indian finance, and he was most anxious that hon. Members would consider various points which arose out of what he had ventured to urge. For instance, he would suggest the importance of considering whether the Public Works in India should be carried out, unless the Establishment charges could be brought into proportion with the value of the work done; and also whether it was advisable to borrow money in India at a higher rate than it could be obtained in this country, unless it could be proved that India would derive advantage from that mode of dealing with the finances of the Dependency. On all the grounds he had stated, he asked the House to agree with him in thinking that the future course of silver, and, therefore, of exchange, would depend upon the absorbing power for silver which India possessed; and it seemed to him that that power depended upon her being rich or poor. She was rich if she had good harvests, economical administration, few absentee allowances; and poor if she had bad harvests, extravagant government, and monstrous absentee allowances. The harvests were not under our control; but we might hope that the usual rule of nature would be followed, and that years of famine would be followed by years of plenty. Might they also hope that extravagant government would be followed by economic rule; that monstrous absentee allowances would be cut down; and that, by a policy of peace abroad and retrenchment at home, the Home Government would do their utmost to put the people of this country in a position to absorb more of India's produce than in days gone by. If they could hope for this, they might expect a brighter future for India; but if they could not, the blackest page in the history of England's Colonial Empire, as far as its finance was concerned, was written.

Mr. J. G. HUBBARD thought the House ought to be thankful to the hon. Member for Bolton for the exceedingly interesting and useful speech in which he had dealt with the industrial progress and financial state of India. Returns showed that both the Revenue and the exports from India during the last 14 years had increased to a very large extent. Looking at that fact, he thought they must come to the conclusion that the financial and industrial condition of India was not such as need cause the serious alarm which had been raised. That difficulties had arisen and called for remedy was beyond doubt; but the question was to how the remedial measures could best be framed. The main cause of the immediate difficulty arose from the exchange difference in the value of the rupee. In India we found, not a gold, but a silver currency, and that currency, being the legal tender and the standard of value, must be dealt with precisely as the sovereign was dealt with here. One of the plans suggested by which to improve the existing state of things was that of a double standard, more properly called an alternative standard, for the one standard must always be in advance of the other in value; and while payments would be made in the less precious metal, the more precious metal would be exported. The other remedy, which was a very ingenious device, was called the bi-metallic system, and bi-metallism had been preached as a doctrine by a variety of distinguished men. It had been remarked that this scheme was entirely free from the inconvenience attaching to a double standard; because, whereas this inconvenience consisted in the fact that one or other of the two standards was always varying in value, under a bi-metallic system, the standards must always remain of the same relative value. The bi-metallic system, however, involved the necessity of all countries—at all events, those within the circle of civilization—combining to determine that gold and silver should, relatively to each other, have a certain defined proportionate value. If we had such a system in this country, any amount of silver, or any amount of gold, might always be introduced and lodged to the credit of the importer at precisely the rate fixed by this cosmopolitan convention. But it would never be possible to obtain from the nations of the world the consensus required before a bi-metallic system could be established. If its establishment were possible, however, what would be the result in England? Why, supposing a Mexican were to discover an exceedingly rich mine, and be able to produce an enormous amount of silver at 1s. an ounce, he would have a right to send it to this country and have it carried to his account at the contract price, which might be 5s. per ounce. The consequence would be that the combined currency of gold and silver would be so much enlarged that the whole of it would deteriorate in value, and that this country might be seriously injured through the diminished value of the medium in which foreigners would discharge their debts to her, now payable in gold. Neither the alternative standard system, nor the bi-metallic system could be adopted in this country if we possessed any reasonable regard for our own interests. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe) had presented a scheme of his own, to which he wished to call the attention of the House, as it was of a nature to challenge criticism. The right hon. Gentleman said that the rupee possessed a much higher value in India than in Europe; and that, though rupees were much depreciated here, in India they maintained very much their old value, so that the same coin had two very different values. With regard to these propositions, he was constrained to demur to the statement that the rupee possessed a much higher value in India than in England. Gold and silver could not be in one country at a higher value than in another, except to the slight extent of the cost of conveyance. With regard to the special scheme presented by the right hon. Gentleman, he quite failed to understand how a currency as good as gold, in which gold was to have no part, could be devised. The right hon. Gentleman wanted to do without gold. This was a scheme which could not be realized, and its announcement might have a mischievous tendency, as it might lead people to suppose that legislation could effect marvels in connection with the question of currency. The House, he contended, ought not to encourage a resort to any empirical remedies. If he were to be asked what should be done in the present state of affairs, he should frankly answer that he did not know what could be done to remedy the irremediable. They could no more reverse the past than they could foretell the state of things which would prevail 12 months hence. The difficulty in which we now stood was the result of circumstances which no legislation could have remedied. The pressure of the German silver constantly hung over the market, and affected its value; but that had a tendency to pass away at present. The difficulty was for this country to receive its Indian revenues in silver and apply them to the discharge of debts in gold at home; and he had come to the conclusion, without being able to suggest any remedy himself, that we ought not to attempt to remove this supposed difficulty by tampering with the currency of India, for successive changes did more to add to the evil than mitigate it. We should enter into no speculative engagements which would prevent a distinct and clear statement of Indian accounts, which was really what we ought to look to. Let them, therefore, adopt the present rate of exchange as regulating the financial affairs of India, balance their accounts, so to say, on that basis, and then start afresh. The Loan of £5,000,000 to India would enable them to tide over a certain time; but he altogether objected to any portion of that loan being made without interest. The idea of a loan without interest was abhorrent to sound finance, for a loan without interest was a gift. If India was in such a state of penury that she could not pay interest, then they ought to give and not to lend her the money. If, on the other hand, they looked forward, as he believed they might, to a prosperous future for India, they ought not to insult her by such an offer as that which had been suggested.

Mr. J. K. Cross

[Third Night.]

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I have listened with all due attention to this debate, though it has extended over a considerable time; and I feel, though India has on this occasion established her title to much more attention than her affairs have usually received from us, yet no extravagant claims have been made on her behalf; on the contrary, I think that we are still rather on the threshold and the surface of great questions connected with the interests of India and her relations with this country which are now forced on our notice. Indeed, everyone who considers the greatness of the Indian problem must at first sight be astonished to perceive how very small is the share of interest the Indian questions appear to excite in this House. In my opinion, the explanation is not very far to seek. It is not that anyone in this House depreciates the vast importance of those questions; it is, if I am right, that this Assembly, which is, I believe, the most active of all deliberative Assemblies in the world, and which transacts by far the greatest amount of business, is also a most over-weighted Assembly, and one, consequently, most in the condition of being obliged to pass by a great number of the important subjects that lie within its jurisdiction, not being physically or morally able to give them anything like the attention they deserve and require. The consequence is that we approach the discussion of Indian affairs now, perhaps, for the first time, under circumstances that are new—new in this respect, that they are now felt to have, what they were formerly only known in the abstract to have, an imperative claim upon the attention of this House. The debate of to-night has taken a course which I have observed with great satisfaction as far as the leading propositions advanced by the speakers are concerned; but it has been restricted almost entirely to the monetary aspects of this question, of which I shall say hardly anything. I cannot, however, approach the discussion without considering the favourable position in which we are now called on to deal with the subject of Indian finance, not as a mere Registration Court, which is, for the most part, what we have been for the transactions of the Indian Department at home and the Indian Government abroad, but as a Parliament which feels that very grave problems present themselves to us, and call upon us for solution in tones which are already loud, and which threaten to become imperative. I cannot help being impressed with the belief that we now stand at a point whereat, unless we are alive to the full gravity and urgency of the situation, the course of events, and that not a very prolonged course, may bring us into a position in which we shall have but one question to face—namely, the question of assuming responsibility for Indian Expenditure, in addition to our own engagements, as a charge upon the British Treasury. That is a contingency which presents to us such gigantic difficulties and dangers that I think, of the two, it is better rather to run the risk of exaggerating than in any way to extenuate the weight and importance of the question immediately before us. If we wish effectually to exclude the arrival of that—I will call it tremendous—contingency, I believe we can only do it by opening our eyes to the full difficulties of Indian finance as they now exist, and by determining to be content with nothing but adequate and effectual remedies. It was with great satisfaction that I heard in the speech of my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for India that Her Majesty's Government were determined to make a serious effort to effect retrenchment in Indian Expenditure. That, of itself, is a great step in the right direction, and I will not stop to discuss whether the communication of that determination was not made at a comparatively late period. That it was made at all must be a cause of much satisfaction to us. But what remains to be considered, and what we have not yet fully ascertained, is whether the view taken by the Government of the range necessary for their economic measures is a range which will be entirely adequate to the circumstances of the case. On looking at the figures presented to us—the £250,000 expected to be saved in the Civil Service, the £650,000 in another important Department, and the rather vague items of saving in Army expenditure—I cannot say that my mind is wholly relieved from apprehension. I have a double apprehension: first, that the measures taken may be comparatively narrow; next, that in point of time they may lag behind the necessities of the case—necessities which are constantly and rapidly accumulating. I am sorry to think that the general state of India does not appear, at the present time, to give a bright and encouraging hue to our discussions. Painful impressions have been received in this country that the economic and material condition of the people of India is not what we should desire. No doubt, exaggerated statements have obtained currency, and salutary corrections have been applied; but I often think we are too apt to fall back on the abstract and theoretical splendour of the possession of the Indian Empire, and we do not sufficiently recollect that the administration of that Empire, in the final judgment of history, will bring no advantage or glory to us, except in the exact and precise proportion that that administration confers benefit upon that Empire, and renders India prosperous and happy. The facts before us in general do not show—I do not speak of what has been done by the particular policy of one Government or another—but I do not think that many in this House will cheer themselves with the belief that the material condition of India is advancing at a rate which they would desire, or, indeed, at a rate—considering the great efforts made to improve its social and legislative and administrative condition—which most reasonable men would expect. There are signs of deep-seated mischiefs the root of which we seem not altogether to have reached. My hon. Friend the Member for the Elgin Burghs (Mr. Grant Duff) referred to disturbances in a particular portion of Bombay with an apprehension which I noticed, especially as coming from him, because I do not think he is at all given to exaggerated views upon any portion of our Indian policy or administration. There are signs of uneasiness, and even of violent uneasiness, in the body politic of that portion of India, which might rapidly spread, and which are disagreeable indications of the general condition. And this brings me to refer to certain measures which have been passed of late years for India, and which, I am afraid, were not only of questionable policy in themselves, but have been productive of deplorable effects. There was, as we all remember, great difference of opinion expressed in this House when the Queen was invested with the title of Empress of India. I am not about to express any adverse opinions upon that measure; but there can be no doubt that the assumption by Her Majesty of that title meant an increase in our responsibility towards India. It was a promise of great things to India—a promise of larger privileges and material advancement. But what has been the course of Indian affairs since the assumption of the title, and what is that assumption likely to carry with it on the minds of the people of India? Why, the period that has since elapsed has been one of peculiar difficulty and augmentation of taxes; and as regards the people, the Government have passed an Arms Act, which places the possession of arms under hard restrictions, and which, unprecedentedly, I believe, in the legislation of India, has much more the character of retrogressive than of advancing legislation. Above all, there has been the passing of that unfortunate measure for the curbing of the Vernacular Press. At a period of financial difficulty like the present, what could have been more important to us than to know what the people of India thought, not merely in their wisdom, but even in their occasional aberration? But this is the period we have chosen to limit the expression of Native sentiment, by placing the whole Vernacular Press at the mercy of the Government. I confess I thought it a most objectionable measure at the time; but I hoped that the Government would allow it to remain a dead letter, like that of the Ecclesiastical Titles Act, and merely to be held up in terrorem. But I have heard with the greatest regret that a journal standing nearly at the head of the Native Press has been placed under warning—that is to say, placed in a condition so precarious and dependent that it can no longer be published—and that on account, not of an editorial article, but merely of a foolish and imprudent letter from a correspondent. Feeling, with the Duke of Buckingham, how important it is to us to know the prevailing currents of Native opinion, I deeply lament this rigorous treatment of the Native Press; and I trust this House will not contentedly suffer that a policy should be pursued in India of a nature to estrange the people from our rule. These are the conditions under which I approach the Revenue of India. As regards that Revenue I think the discussion this evening, and especially the very able speech of the hon. Member for Bolton (Mr. J. K. Cross), which has afforded most valuable information to the House, has shown that we ought to beware of attempting to meet difficulties which may be temporary, and which, at any rate, arise under the operation of natural laws, by empirical remedies, and that we ought to preserve those general principles in relation to currency which experience has shown to be sound. The hon. Member for Bolton has raised the very important question whether we have not greatly exaggerated the magnitude of our loss by the Indian exchanges. The Government themselves have greatly reduced the figures in which the loss was ostensibly represented. Instead of £3,000,000 or £4,000,000, they place the loss at a sum not greatly exceeding £2,000,000. [Mr. E. STANHOPE: £2,750,000.] I beg pardon; I thought it was less. But what I wish to call attention to is the offset which the hon. Member for Bolton showed us we gained from opium—an offset amounting probably to £1,500,000. It is very important that the observations of the hon. Member for Bolton on this point should have their full weight with the House. It is not for me to say whether they can be impugned. If not, they will tend to impress us with the conviction that, however inconvenient and disagreeable, however costly even and injurious, within certain limits, to the Government of England the present depression in the value of silver might be, it is not one of the main subjects with which we have to deal. It is an evil probably of a transitory character—one which the natural law of supply and demand will in due time remedy. There are other matters more deserving of attention. The hon. Member for Bolton has referred to the revenue from opium from an important point of view—namely, its relation to the value of silver, and I wish to consider it from another point quite different. Nearly all that is said upon this subject appears to be based upon the assumption that Indian Revenue is in the main like British Revenue, that it is as much within our control, and that we can equally assure its continuance and reckon upon its solidity. But we have no right to reckon upon the opium revenue as if it were a domestic revenue, because it is so largely dependent on the policy and legislation of a foreign country. It is all very well to say there is something in the quality of Indian opium which will insure the demand for it; but we ought not, as prudent men, to found our hopes of a revenue on such an opinion, which may at any time be falsified by improved methods of cultivation or treatment in China. The revenue from opium is not to be counted upon like the revenue from land, or like that from salt, which, be it objectionable or not, is under our control. The opium revenue we may accept with more or less compunction and regret, as ministering to our present necessity; but we have no right to reckon upon its full continuance. This is one consideration that ought not to be overlooked; another is the loss by exchange, though it may not be so large as it is sometimes assumed to be; and another is the recurrence of Famines every few years—a matter not yet divested of formidable features. I cannot omit referring to another subject, on the merits of which we are at issue with the Government—the unhappy Afghan War. Having regard to the extent of the operations, the number of troops in the field, the time they have been beyond the Indian Frontier, the altitudes at which they have been encamped, the season of the year, and the means of transport, if the cost be defrayed by the £670,000 charged on the financial year just expired, and the £2,000,000 to be put on the Indian Estimates, the economy of the war will have been truly wonderful. The Abyssinian War, which was a military operation extending over only a few weeks, cost some £9,000,000, and far exceeded all the estimates. I do not feel assured that the costs of the Afghan War will not be greater, considering what the cost of the former Afghan War was under the administration of the East India Company, which was certainly not less economical than that of the present Indian Government. I must, in passing, express deep regret at the charge of this expense on the Indian Revenue. It is impossible to answer the arguments contained in the Petitions from India presented by myself and others. I am afraid a deep sense of wrong and resentment will be generated in India by a course so little worthy of the greatness and magnanimity of this country as calling upon the impoverished people of India to bear nearly the entire charge. I do not say the whole charge, because a loan without interest is simply a mode of making a small contribution to the expenses of the war. I am afraid the charging of the greater part of this expense upon India will engender—and I am not prepared to say it ought not to engender—a sense of wrong, not extravagantly extended beyond the bounds of the subject, and of ungenerous treatment. I do not perceive that the Government have taken into account the effect of the war upon the future permanent finances of India. It is admitted that there are immediate expenses to be incurred; but will there not be a permanent increase of expense? We have advanced into a difficult country, and have undertaken to hold mountain passes, without escaping from any internal responsibilities. A high authority, Sir Alexander Arbuthnot, who was intrusted with the introduction of the Vernacular Press Act, and who approved the policy of the Afghan War, has recorded his opinion that it will entail a permanent increase of military charges; and since then it has been announced that a subsidy is to be regularly, and by Treaty, payable to the new Ameer. With regard to the remission of the import duties, there seems to me to be something distinctly repugnant in the way it has been done in the time of India's distress and difficulty, by the Government of a Party which has done all in its power to retain every protective duty in this country, and which, from year to year, as the occasion arises, advises the Crown to assent to Colonial Acts imposing fresh duties upon British manufactures. What an invidious, almost odious, picture of inequality we exhibit to the millions of India! The Free Trade doctrines that we hold so dear, that we apply them against the feeling of the Indian people in their utmost rigour and without a grain of mercy, disappear in a moment when it is a question of dealing with those whose interests and opinions we cannot lightly tamper with—namely, the free Colonists of this Empire. The Governor General says he cannot see that financial difficulty can in any way be pleaded as a reason against what he calls fiscal reform. If that be a true principle of government, it has been discovered for the first time by the present Viceroy. There has not been a Free Trade Government in this or any country which has not freely admitted that the state of the Revenue is an essential element in the consideration of the application even of the best principles of Free Trade. An argument has been used by the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) which it is difficult to answer; at any rate, it is high time it should be answered, if answer can be given. In an able article on Indian finance, he has put this question—

Mr. J. G. Hubbard

[Third Night.]

—
Mr. Gladstone

“If you determine to apply your doctrines of Free Trade, why do you apply them to the import duties upon cotton goods, and why not to the export duties on Indian produce? On every principle which has governed legislation in this direction, export duties have been marked out as the very first victims to be offered on the altar of Free Trade. In this instance there is the strongest additional reason for beginning with the export duties, for one of your embarrassments is the state of exchange, the difficulties of remittance, and the low prices at which Indian bills are sold in consequence of the want of a market for them.”

This argument is one we are entitled to expect Her Majesty's Government to meet in full if they intend to adhere to this measure, which has been, I think, precipitately and unwisely adopted in opposition to the strong sentiment of the Indian people for the repeal of the cotton duties. It will not be supposed that I am one who can recommend those duties upon principle as desirable, in comparison with others, when you can afford to part with them. It is the time and circumstances of their repeal which appear to me to constitute its gravity. Indian Revenue appears to be surrounded with an unusual number of risks and difficulties. It is less solid on its basis than a corresponding Revenue of equal amount in our own country, or, probably, in any other. There are peculiarities in its nature; it is hampered by the difficulties of exchange; it does not show that solidity and up-springing power in meeting difficult times which we should desire; and the review of the whole case greatly deepens in my mind—as I think it may also in the minds of others—a sense of the gravity of the situation, and a conviction that we ought not to put ourselves off with any unreal, or even with secondary or inefficient remedies, but, if we can, go to the root of the matter. Then, there is the question of new taxes. And there, again, I find official statements put forward which seem to indicate a belief that, upon the occurrence of an adequate cause, it would not be such a difficult matter to discover new taxes to be imposed in India. But how does this matter really stand? The experience of this country goes far towards establishing this financial proposition—that the imposition of an Income Tax is to be considered rather in the nature of a last resource in time of peace. The Income Tax has been tried in India, and, as I am convinced, has proved a failure. What have you done?—I do not say done wrongly; it is an indication of the real state of things, and the necessity under which we lie. You have established a licence tax, on which I shall only make two observations. The first is, that I cannot justify the resorting to this description of tax upon Indian enterprise and industry without you establish a corresponding tax upon English enterprise and industry in India and all English official salaries. But my main point is this—that you carry your licence tax down to incomes of £10 8s. per annum, so that a man who has 4s. a-week on which to maintain his family is called upon to pay the tax. I do not presume to say that this is wrong. It would be going far beyond what my knowledge would justify if I were to say so; but I say this, that if it is right, it proves that you have reached the limit of taxation. That is a proposition of enormous scope and importance, because it reduces the Government to this position—that in their duty of providing a deficiency which is now stated at £3,250,000 annually, with so many dangers and embarrassments surrounding the whole prospect of Indian Revenue, they have, humanly speaking, no title to look to the imposition of new taxes. Therefore, the whole force of the arguments and speeches we have heard, even to a great extent the speech of the Under Secretary of State for India himself, goes to show that to retrenchment, and to retrenchment alone, we must look for meeting the difficulty. And if the scale of necessity has not been enormously mistaken, this retrenchment must be a very large retrenchment. My hon. Friend the Member for the Elgin Burghs (Mr. Grant Duff), who is by no means given to exaggeration in his views of Indian policy, but whose reputed disposition is, on the contrary, to colour it too favourably, has fixed the measure of retrenchment he considers necessary to give solidity to Indian finance at £4,000,000 a-year. That is a very grave statement, and I do not believe it is an exaggerated one. It means that there must be a reduction of what we may call 10 per cent, or from 10 to 12 per cent all round, in the real Expenditure of India. I think the race of economists, which was at one time a thriving and prosperous race and multiplied in the land, has of late dwindled away, and is now only represented in this House and elsewhere by here and there a solitary individual. But the most sanguine of these solitary individuals would, I am sure, make this admission freely—that it is no trifle you propose to yourselves when you talk of making a reduction of anything like £4,000,000 in the Expenditure of India. The main question is—in what temper are we to approach the operation? Are we to approach it in the spirit which is disposed to allow this plea and that, this inconvenience and that, nay, even to conjure up phantoms of possible dangers, as conclusive reasons against reduction, irrespective of the fact that there is no danger more pressing, or more formidable, than the condition of a country whose expenses are greatly in excess of its real income? To escape that great danger you must be prepared to take measures of corresponding strength. You must not proceed by paltry and peddling steps; you must not be afraid to have it cast in your teeth that you are making reductions in modes inconsistent with the dignity of this Government, or with the efficiency of the Service, or even with the security of the country, provided you believe that efficiency and security are not to be placed in real peril. You must get rid of a vast amount of conventional estimates; and it depends upon the rejection of these conventional estimates whether your measures of retrenchment will be effectual or not. Small measures of retrenchment will be worthless, and not only so, but if they blind us during the moments that are so precious to the real magnitude of the emergencies with which we have to deal, the mischief they may thus do may be greater than the good which they effect by establishing a partial saving here and there. I will say but a very few words upon the different heads of Expenditure. There is the question of the Civil Service. I think it is difficult to resist the force of those arguments urged on behalf of the Indian people themselves and by Indians, as they were indicated to-night by my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) from the Petitions he presented with regard to Civil Service appointments. I think we must not be turned aside by apprehensions such as those the Under Secretary of State for India put forward—namely, the fear lest we repel from seeking Indian appointments the class of men we require. I do not want to repel any such men; but we shall travel a good way before we reach the point at which that repulsion will take place. In the first quarter of a century of my lifetime every Government and every Parliament was firmly, and in a masculine spirit, set upon economy. I am sorry to say that I cannot congratulate recent Governments or recent Parliaments upon having acted upon similar principles. It is for this House to take care that it earnestly discharges its great and important duty of acting as a check upon the spending dispositions of the Government of the day, and so prevent itself from becoming that which I am afraid it has a tendency to become—the most powerful organization for increasing the heavy burdens now laid upon the people. There is one subject which I hope will not escape attention—the question of the conversion of stocks from high rates to low ones—which I believe to be a practical and available, though limited, means of real and solid economy, which would have the secondary advantage of acting upon the portentous mass of remittance to this country, which has been admirably described as the core of the financial and economical difficulties of the case. As regards the proposed reduction in the expenditure on the Indian Army, it would be premature and most unwise of me to enter into the subject in detail; but what I cannot help fearing in some degree is that this question of reduction in the Indian Army has been viewed by the Government as a small subject, and from which no great results will follow. I trust that it is not so; for, if it be so, then, I confess, my expectations of retrieving the position of our Indian finance will be sorely damped. I should be very sorry if this subject were to be dealt with as one calling merely for the appointment of a Commission in India. It appears to me that there are many questions of principle connected with Indian Army finance reform, and with other subjects, which require to be considered in England quite as much as in India. It appears to me that leading principles which ought to be at the root of reform and retrenchment in the Indian Army are matters that ought to be either wholly or mainly considered and determined here. It is difficult to bring home to the minds of Indian Administrators the necessity that has arisen for economy in Indian finances, and for this reason—because no system could be devised which would throw upon them the ultimate responsibility. Neither the officers of the Army, the Council of the Governor General, nor even the Viceroy himself, are the persons who are ultimately responsible for the success or failure of Indian finance. The glory or the shame in connection with it may be in part reaped or suffered by them; but the ultimate responsibility must devolve here, upon those who sit upon these Benches within these walls. And I confess I am very jealous of mere professional delegations on these subjects, and most jealous when their operations are to be carried out in India. I do not agree with those who think that much is to be gained for India by a re-adjustment of the Home charges. It is true that there are men on the Indian Establishment, paid for by India, who are not in India; but it is also true that you do not make a man a soldier by putting a red coat on his back—he must be trained, he must learn his profession, and until he has learned his profession up to a certain point he is not practically a soldier. I have much more difficulty, I own, in dealing with the statement of the hon. Member for Bolton (Mr. J. K. Cross), extracted from the evidence taken before the Committee, of the officers borne on the Indian Establishment—that one-fourth are usually in this country. I am not presuming to blame anyone in this matter; but it is very difficult, with justice to India, to reconcile such facts. It is still more difficult to reconcile them with the doctrine, plausibly held, that, whatever retrenchment we think of in Indian expenditure, we must on no account reckon on a reduction in the British garrison in that country. It was pointed out in the debate on this subject during the last Parliament, that India derives some advantage from having in England what may be termed a military bank. That military bank is obliged to keep, as it were, in its coffers, an available fund to meet all demands. When the authorities in India want more British soldiers, they simply draw a draft upon the military bank in this country, and they get those soldiers at a moment's notice. When the authorities in India find that they have more British soldiers than they want, they send home so many regiments, and those regiments are immediately thrown upon the charges of this country. That is, undoubtedly, a matter which must be taken into consideration when you look at the system of Home charges, because on certain points of detail you might possibly find that some retrenchment could be made for the advantage of this country by transferring this charge to the British Exchequer. The greater question of the military reorganization in India I will not presume to deal with further than to say that many think that the present system of military transport for India is one of enormous cost, and that it would be better to resort to the cheaper and wiser system of relying upon the free and independent shipping market. That is a subject not entirely without importance; but there are questions still connected with military organization in India, which, in my opinion, you will have to search to the bottom. It is not for me even to indicate them, since they are questions two or three removes from the subject under our immediate consideration; but I am convinced that if you are to effect the work you have taken in hand, you must have large retrenchments in the Indian Service, from top to bottom, and those retrenchments must largely include subjects of military expenditure. In all their measures of retrenchment and financial reform, I hope Her Majesty's Government will have special regard to the extreme desirableness, not only as a political, but as an economical measure, of locating Indian expenditure, as well as Indian service in India itself—to check, to arrest, if possible, to reverse, that injurious and even disastrous movement of the vast increase of remittances to this country—on all grounds, that is a subject of great importance. There is another question on which I wish to say a word. A long acquaintance with the financial system of this country has shown me that, whatever remains of economy there may be in our present system of Public Expenditure, and whatever hope that the spirit of retrenchment which possessed this House 30, 40, and 50 years ago may again return upon it, a very large share—an essential share—of the credit and efficiency of all measures for giving effect to those hopes belongs not to this or that Party, but to a particular Department of the Government and to its admirable organization—namely, the British Treasury, which is itself responsible to this House. Looking at Indian Expenditure, we must feel how completely wanting is anything bearing the faintest resemblance to the British Treasury. The control of the British Treasury over every other Department is a control felt not only after long intervals, but from day to day. It is part of the circulation of the life of the whole system, and it affects and modifies the entire character of our Expenditure. That Expenditure is now between £80,000,000 and £90,000,000. But when we pass over to India, with its Expenditure exceeding one-half of that amount, we find a total absence of anything of the same kind. The men who are connected with Indian finance have, no doubt, the best dispositions and intentions, as far as they are personally concerned, in regard to saving the resources which are extracted in the shape of taxation from the Indian people. But they have none of the advantages which the British Treasury possesses. I do not think you can supply that tremendous void by any contrivance such as has suggested itself to my mind; but I am still convinced that a good deal might be done by introducing some direct influence drawn from the fountain-head of the English Treasury upon Indian Expenditure, not to affect those questions where the Indian Exchequer and the British are in competition with each other. On those questions, and on those alone, I should hold the English Treasury to be biased. But I believe that by an agency judiciously chosen and applied, we might bring some part of the rules and of the spirit of the English Treasury to bear on the details of Indian finance. That is a point which I would strongly commend to the serious attention of the Government. Far from enforcing any difference of view between those on this side and those who sit opposite—far from seeking the miserable gratification of making good and driving home any accusation against any one in this grave matter, what I most earnestly of all desire is, that this body of the Representatives of the people of England, upon whom, in the last resort, the whole responsibility must fall, should fully and clearly understand that they are approaching, and are called upon to deal with, no remote or secondary matter of the interest of a Dependency; but that they have to solve a problem, the solution of which is intimately associated, it may be, with the material, but undoubtedly with all the higher moral, interests of the nation and with the honour of the Empire.

[Third Night.]

Mr. Gladstone

[Third Night.]

Mr. SMOLLETT said, there was a great air of unreality, generally speaking, in that House when they came to discuss an Indian subject. In this present Session the Government stated that they were going to bring forward the Financial Statement of India in the month of May, and it was admitted on both sides that the matter was going to be made one of Party and faction. A "Whip" went out on each side, and a great audience was secured. But when, on the very first night of the debate, the intention was abandoned of making this a Party and factious fight, then all interest in the matter subsided; apathy, indifference, and neglect prevailed in every quarter. Great orators, such as the hon. Member for Orkney (Mr. Laing), and the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell), spoke to empty Benches, for very few people in that House cared one straw for India so long as the Indian dividends were paid. Tonight, and for the last two nights of the debate, they had heard nothing discussed except the currency question. The only speech he had heard worth listening to was the speech delivered by the right hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone). The right hon. Gentleman went to the root of the matter, and spoke of retrenchment, economy, and reform; things which were dear formerly to hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side, but of which very little care was taken now. It was upon these doctrines solely that he intended to address the House. He would speak quite unreservedly of officials on both sides. In his judgment, the affairs of India had got into a state of great derangement; but both Parties, both factions in that House, were answerable for that derangement, and the Liberal Party was more responsible than the Tory Party, because they had been longer in Office. The seeds of financial waste were sown in India many years ago; and lately, in 1874, when the present Government came into power, they succeeded to what he might call a damnosa hereditas in the management of India. He dared say that the Administration did not know it; they did not even now realize the idea; but it was true. The fact was, that the right hon. Member for Greenwich, in his Administration, intrusted the government of India in England to the Duke of Argyll, and, perhaps, among Liberal statesmen there was no man less competent than was his Grace to perform the duties which then devolved upon him. Nevertheless, the Duke of Argyll got on very smoothly in the India Office so long as Lord Mayo was Viceroy and Governor General of India, for Lord Mayo was a man of intrepidity, a man of character, and a man who would not be imposed upon, and he was an ardent supporter of economy and retrenchment in Indian Expenditure. One of the cardinal features of Lord Mayo's Administration, the keystone of his policy, was that he would not allow a single rupee to be spent on what were called Extraordinary Works. They were now called "productive," but they were falsely so called. But why did not Lord Mayo allow any money to be spent on what were called productive works? Because Lord Mayo had taken the Public Works Department under his own charge. He knew the extravagant demands of that Department; he knew that it overrode all the other Departments of India; he knew the lavish expenditure which was constantly going on in that Department; he was determined to put a stop to it, and he did. In the last year of his Administration, he only permitted the Public Works Establishment to spend £1,500,000 upon "Extraordinary Works," and the keystone of his policy was that no money should be expended except what came from the revenues of the year in which it was spent. But in February, 1872, when Lord Mayo fell by the dagger of an assassin in one of the Andaman Islands, the policy of retrenchment and reform was abandoned, and the vicious policy which now existed was established under the orders of the Duke of Argyll, and with the concurrence of Lord Northbrook. What the present Government, therefore, was answerable for was that they did not prevent that policy from being continued when they came into Office in 1874. They permitted that waste to continue, and now they had got into a state of difficulty which it would require all the courage of great statesmen to face. In that respect he quite agreed with the right hon. Member for Greenwich. In his judgment, the state of financial affairs revealed in Calcutta in January last was most disheartening. The accounts then published referred to three distinct years of Revenue and financial management—the years 1877, 1878, and 1879. In each of those years the wretched system of making a distinction between ordinary and extraordinary Expenditure was persevered in. That system, in his opinion, was introduced for purposes of delusion, and it was continued to prevent Parliament from seeing the real state of affairs. But his object was to show the result. In 1877 the ordinary Expenditure exceeded the entire income of the year by £3,543,087. But that was not the deficit of the year. In that year £4,790,052 was borrowed, and expended upon what were called Extraordinary Works, now classed under the delusive epithet of "productive outlays." The deficit was, therefore, largely augmented, and the Revenue fell below the Expenditure by £8,334,800. That certainly showed a very sad kind of management of the finances of the country. In 1878, £2,000,000 of fresh taxation was placed on the people of India, which, however, did not yield that sum. In that year the Finance Minister made the very tardy admission that we were living beyond our income in India; that it was necessary to impose fresh taxes to bring about an equilibrium, and to provide a Famine Insurance Fund of £1,500,000 sterling. Our Rulers in India seemed to think that every 10 years there must be a Famine, and that £15,000,000 must be expended upon it. He thought that a delusion; and he was quite sure there would be many Famines in India, if £15,000,000 were to be expended on each recurring Famine. In 1878 the fresh taxation was entirely absorbed, and the Famine Insurance Fund existed only on paper. In that year, £4,599,000 was expended in what were falsely called reproductive outlays, and the deficit in the Revenue was £3,299,000. Then came the present year, 1879-80, for which we had only got the estimate of accounts. This year, the first time in 20 years, we had a war expenditure in India, and the amount charged against the year 1879-80 was £2,000,000. That war, in his opinion, was a just and necessary war, and he had supported it in that House. It was a war undertaken for the purpose of driving the Russians out of Afghanistan, and preventing that Power ever having a paramount influence in the government of that State. That war was supposed to have cost £2,000,000. India in former days could have paid three or four times the amount, and would have no difficulty in paying it now if the country were governed on the principles of common sense and justice; but India was ruled at the present moment in a very different spirit. What was the issue of the present year? These £2,000,000 were properly charged to the ordinary Expenditure; and the Expenditure exceeded the income by

[Third Night.]

Mr. Smollett

£1,395,000. In addition to this, Lord Lytton modestly asked for £3,500,000 more to be spent on productive outlays—on works which were not worth a farthing—and the consequence would be, if that waste were permitted, that we should have this year a deficiency of £4,895,000. In the three years, 1877-8-9, the Expenditure of India exceeded the income by £16,500,000, and it would have been £20,000,000 but for the fresh taxation of 1879. This state of Indian finance, in his opinion, was not only serious, but most alarming. It was the more alarming because we had always had “prosperity speeches” delivered in connection with Indian finance. The noble Lord the late Under Secretary of State for India (Lord George Hamilton) never appeared so happy as when dilating on the great benefits India was deriving from possessing an irresponsible Secretary of State—for the Secretary of State for India was practically irresponsible. The noble Lord used to revel in his statements of imaginary surplus millions flowing into the Exchequer of India, and fructifying there for the benefit of the people. When Members got up and spoke about deficits, they were told they did not know what they were talking about. They were ignorant of the very A B C of finance; no one could understand that subject but the noble Lord. He (Mr. Smollett) had once modestly hinted that the prosperity accounts on which the noble Lord relied were based upon cooked accounts; but the noble Lord was indignant. He said it was a foul aspersion on great Departments in India—on Gentlemen who were a great deal too honest to cook accounts. He made the charge; he adhered to the charge; and he repeated the charge, with this addition—that the accounts were purposely cooked, and he should prove it. The noble Lord the Secretary of State for India at that time (the Marquess of Salisbury), speaking in “another place” on the 4th of March, 1876, stated that the finances of India were in a most prosperous condition. He said the finances were admirably managed; that in four years, if the accounts sent to him by Lord Northbrook were correct, from 1869 to 1873 inclusive, there were enormous surplus revenues brought into the Exchequer and accounted for. They amounted to the magnificent sum of £8,571,000. These were surplus receipts, after paying every proper charge in India and in this country. The noble Lord the Under Secretary of State, of course, re-echoed this statement in that House. Not having the fear of Secretaries of State and noble Lords before his eyes, he ventured, on the 13th of February, 1877, to move a Resolution declaring that the House viewed with alarm the state of Indian finance; but he had some difficulty in finding a seconder. The hon. Member for Ashton (Mr. Mellor) seconded it. The noble Lord, in replying to his Resolution, declared that there was not a word of truth in it from beginning to end. “Deficit,” said the noble Lord, “why, in this very year, the accounts of which are just about to close—in the year 1875-6—there is, and will be found, a clear surplus of £1,700,000, after paying every proper charge that the Government can bring against the Revenue.” The noble Lord made that somewhat audacious assertion in a year when he had refused to permit any alteration in the cotton duties paid in India, on the ground that there was no surplus Revenue. The noble Lord said—“You talk of deficits at a period when no Secretary of State has been required to borrow one single halfpenny”—or as they would call it in Scotland, not a single baubee, in order to carry on the Government of India for the last 10 years.” “Deficit! Why, in the six years from 1869 to 1875 we have had a surplus of £13,000,000, after paying every possible charge. There has been a Famine in these years. There was a Famine in 1874-5, and the amount of money spent in that year in respect of the Famine was £6,500,000, or very nearly £7,000,000.” “Who paid it,” he said. “We had not to borrow the money. It is a perfect delusion to suppose that we have borrowed the money to pay for it. It was paid out of the £13,000,000 of surplus which accrued from 1869 to 1875. And there were £6,500,000 left after paying that enormous charge.” About that charge there was a perfect scandal. There was no Famine in Bengal in those years. There was a death, but nothing like a famine, and £1,500,000 would meet every possible charge that could be honestly made in respect of expenditure in India in those years. [“Hear, hear!”] He was glad to hear an hon. Member on the Opposition side take that view. He (Mr. Smollett) once had a different view himself; but he had found that what he now stated was the fact. His opinion was that there was not a word of truth in the statement about Famine expenditure and a surplus of £6,500,000, and that it was furnished from cooked accounts. The money to meet the Famine had been borrowed in the City of London, and the balance of £6,500,000 remaining in the Treasury was a myth. But the noble Lord assumed all this to be true, and spoke of the prosperity of Indian finance. He said that in normal years there was a clear surplus of £2,000,000 sterling per annum—a sum sufficient to meet Famine charges, and to leave still most satisfactory surplus receipts in the Indian Treasuries. Now, these statements were perfectly true in one sense; but they were most fallacious and deceptive in another aspect. They were true, provided we shut our eyes and refused to acknowledge the fact that the Government was borrowing largely in each of the years during which we boasted of surplus receipts. In those years the Government borrowed millions of money and kept the loans out of sight, carrying the sums borrowed to the head of a suspense account, or entering the loans on account under the head of “recoverable assets.” This mode of dealing with loans might be correct, provided the money borrowed had been honestly spent upon productive works—works which, within a limited period, produced large returns, and provided great care had been taken to prevent large outlays being charged as recoverable, although spent on undertakings which were wholly unproductive. Parliament was constantly assured that this was the case, that no works made with borrowed capital were sanctioned in India, save such as were sure to be largely reproductive. These were the accounts and statements which he assailed as unvarnished. He frequently quoted instances of irrigation canals upon which millions had been wasted, and from which no returns were anticipated. His charges were disbelieved. Nobody took the smallest notice of them; but they were true nevertheless, and the truth was disclosed in 1877, just three or four weeks after the speech of the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex had been made, in which he took credit for a surplus of £13,000,000 in six years. In March, 1877, Sir John Strachey brought forward the Budget for that year. He took what he called a hopeful account of India at that period. He demanded £4,000,000 for Extraordinary Works, for productive works which produced nothing but mischief; but the Finance Minister admitted that in this sum there was a charge for works, which ought to have been classed as ordinary, amounting to £1,200,000. This charge had been erroneously foisted into the account. Sir John Strachey next admitted that he had looked over the accounts of his predecessors in office for the last six or seven years, and had found, somewhat to his surprise, that £4,700,000 had been expended in those years, and had been regarded as recoverable assets, which had been expended on railways made for military purposes, works never expected to yield mercantile profits. Lord Lytton admitted that this was true, acknowledging that positive orders had been sent from England not to allow undertakings of this nature to be entered as extraordinary; but these orders had been disregarded. Now, what was this but a direct admission that the accounts of Expenditure had been improperly cooked in order to show surplus receipts of Revenue when none existed. But this was not all. The Finance Minister said nothing of vast sums wasted upon irrigation works wholly unproductive, yet, in like manner, treated as productive outlays, although no one knew the fact better than Sir John Strachey. For, in this Budget Statement for 1877, he proposed to impose on certain districts of Bengal a local cess of £275,000 a-year. This local cess was imposed to recoup the Government for the interest of some £6,000,000 sterling spent on irrigation canals, which were found when finished to be wholly unproductive. The demand was a most discreditable one; but the fact that it was made amounted to an admission that, with the military charges, a sum of £12,000,000 had been carried to a false or improper account, and had been treated as a recoverable asset; whereas the money should have been charged to the ordinary Expenditure of the years in which the outlay was made. These admissions proved how erroneous were the calculations of surplus receipts made in the six preceding years by the Under Secretary of State. In the same year, in December, 1877, the Finance Minister imposed fresh taxes upon India, which were expected to produce £2,000,000 sterling, upon the ground that the money was urgently required; while in February, 1877, the Under Secretary of State was boasting of a clear surplus of £2,000,000 annually then existing, sufficient to meet Famine charges, and still leaving larger surplus receipts upon an average of six financial years. These contradictory statements, proceeding at one and the same time from officials in Calcutta and in London, sufficiently displayed the ignorance which, two years ago, prevailed in the matter of Indian finance. In Asia, as in Europe, these gentlemen lived in a Fool's Paradise. In the speech of the Under Secretary of State (Lord George Hamilton) on the 13th February, 1877, the noble Lord insisted that it was popularly believed that the Government of the late East India Company practised a strict economy, while the Imperial Administration was extravagant and wasteful. The reverse, he said, was the truth. The noble Lord proved it in this way. He took India from 1814 up to the period when the Company's rule ceased, and he said that during those years the East India Company exceeded its income by £72,000,000. £42,000,000 of this amount were added to the National Debt from 1814 up to the year 1856; and during the last three years—from 1857 to 1859 inclusive—£30,000,000 more were borrowed to put down insurrection. The noble Lord declared that the whole of this was unproductive expenditure—that £72,000,000 had been recklessly wasted. He never heard a more extraordinary statement than that, or a more odious comparison. In 1814 the Company did not possess one-half of the territory which we now held in India. It did not enjoy anything like a moiety of the revenues which we now drew from those territories. From that period—1814—up to 1855-6, the East India Company was engaged in constant wars—wars of aggression, usurpation, conquest, and annexation. During those years the Company was engaged in acquiring, in building up, and in consolidating the vast Empire over which Her Majesty now reigned—he wished she reigned with greater success. The Marquess of Hastings was Governor General at that time. He carried on great and successful and expensive wars against the Mahratta powers, and spent huge sums in putting down the Pindarree insurgents. The successor of the noble Marquess was Lord Amherst, who quarrelled with the King of Burmah. He spent £10,000,000 or £12,000,000 in a Burmese war, and he added the present Tenasserim Provinces by conquest to our Empire. At a later period Lord Auckland sent a great military expedition into Central Asia—into Afghanistan—costing £17,000,000, paid by the East India Company, borrowed in India, and no difficulty found about the borrowing of it. That was part of the £42,000,000 spent up to 1855-6. Lord Ellenborough succeeded. He lived in an atmosphere of war, and had a passion for war. On one occasion, at a meeting in Calcutta, he (Mr. Smollett) heard Lord Ellenborough declare that the only moments of unalloyed enjoyment in his official life were those which he had spent in the camp. Lord Hardinge, who followed, entered into a fierce struggle with the Sikh Army, which was at last overthrown, and we added the Punjab to our rule. Then came Lord Dalhousie, who annexed Pegu and Oude, which led to the Mutiny, costing £30,000,000. The Mutiny was suppressed, and we secured possession of one of our finest States, Oude. No doubt, the East India Company spent £72,000,000 in that way; but it was idle to say that the expenditure was not productive. It produced the Indian Empire; it added annually £30,000,000 to £40,000,000 to our means. The charge which he (Mr. Smollett) brought against the Imperial Administration was this—that ever since Her Majesty's Government took possession in 1860, in a time of profound peace, it had managed India with such an utter want of discretion, prudence, thrift, and economy, that at the present moment we were, and for many years past had been, drifting into something like bankruptcy. He had the accounts of India during the last seven years, going back to 1873, in his hands, and he would read them. Why did he go back to that year? Because that was the first year of Lord Northbrook's Administration, and because, in 1872, under Lord Mayo, who had enforced economy to a vast extent, there was a surplus of income. But Lord Mayo's policy was set aside with this result—the deficit of income in 1873-4 was £5,360,000; in 1874-5 the deficit was £3,930,000; in 1875-6 the deficit was £2,601,000; in 1876-7 it was £5,992,000; in 1877-8 it was £8,334,000; in 1878-9 it was £3,299,000; and for 1879-80 it was estimated at £4,895,000. The total deficit in seven years was, therefore, £34,500,000 in round figures. The increased taxes imposed to meet this state of affairs were destroying the loyalty of the people of India to our Government. We must now make reductions, for this state of things should not be permitted to continue. What, then, was the remedy? We were told that a change had at last come over the official mind, that the gravity of the situation was admitted. The confession of amendment was certainly not hearty, although they heard no more of millions of surplus receipts fructifying in the Indian Treasuries. The necessity of cautious economy was admitted; but the reductions contemplated were peddling. If the statements he had just quoted of the deficits of the last seven years were true, a reduction of at least £6,000,000 sterling of annual Expenditure was needed to place the Government of India in a secure position. What was the proper position of a Government? It should be able to meet, one year with another, the entire ordinary and extraordinary Expenditure from the annual Revenue without borrowing. A strong Government should have a considerable surplus Revenue to meet emergencies, whether of War or of Famine—it should have funds at its disposal to reduce the National Debt, or to remove onerous and grinding taxation. Steps to insure this should be taken. The hon. Member for the Elgin Burghs (Mr. Grant Duff) stated in this discussion that Lord Mayo had cut down the lavish expenditure of Lord Lawrence by £5,000,000. Why, he (Mr. Smollett) asked, could not this, and more than this, be done again, and in the same way? Of course, a man of determination, and of pluck, and of backbone was required to do this; and as Lord Lytton was, confessedly, not a statesman of this sort, another plan must be taken. In his (Mr. Smollett's) judgment, a Royal Commission should be forthwith despatched to India empowered to carry out large reductions in the expenditure of the Civil and Military Services, to the extent of at least £2,000,000 per annum, and that in the space of one year. Some £5,000,000 more could be saved at once by wise reductions in the Establishment of Public Works. He should not enter then upon a history of the origin and growth of this Department. The Establishment, in its present position and magnitude, was universally spoken of as the scourge and curse of our Government. He had it from a high authority that the cost in wages, salaries, and emoluments was at least £1,250,000 a-year. He should suggest that one-half of the Establishment, beginning with its head, Sir Andrew Clarke, should be discharged; and that a maximum sum of £600,000 should be the limit of the charge for the Department in future. He saw from the public accounts that the disbursements under the head of Ordinary amounted to £3,500,000 a-year. He knew that the expenditure under the head of Extraordinary had been £4,700,000 in the last two years—thus, the entire charge in each year was, with the office Establishment £9,500,000. In his judgment, the expenditure should be limited and fixed at £4,000,000, including cost of Establishment; and this should on no account, be exceeded. If this were done, there would be a saving of £5,500,000 a-year. He might add, in conclusion, that great and sweeping retrenchments of this character would restore confidence and loyalty to the Native mind. The suggestions he had made were simple, easy of accomplishment, and thoroughly practical. They would make no impression upon official minds, he was sure, on either side of the House—for officialism detested frugality. Retrenchment and common sense, applied to Indian finance, were repugnant to the official mind.

[Third Night.]

MR. RATHBONE: I am sure it must be a matter of great satisfaction to all those who have really watched the course of our management of the affairs of India that at last there seems some approach on the part of the House to recognizing the importance and difficulty of the task which we have undertaken in the government of that country. I have only one comment to make on the very able speech of my hon. Friend the Under Secretary for India in opening the debate—that it was only too able, and too successful in one of the objects he had in view, that of allaying alarm; for, in order to give him power to carry out the reforms contemplated, it is necessary that public opinion in England should continue alive to the very serious, though by no means hopeless, position of the finances of India. The hon. Gentleman's admissions were so candid, and his assurances in many respects so satisfactory, that it was evident that hon. Members went away with the feeling that though there had been danger, the Government, being aware of that danger, it was a thing of the past. But this is very far from being the case. I do not propose to go at all into the general question; but having studied very carefully the last India Financial Statement, ordered to be printed on the 2nd May, 1879, and having listened attentively to the debate, I want to call attention to some points which, in the interests of the people of India, as contrasted with the Government, the trading community, and the capitalists of this country, have not been sufficiently considered. First, with regard to productive Public Works, the Indian Government say, in the Financial Statement, paragraph 11, page 5, that—

“The financial condition of that State is unsound whose yearly Public Revenues, rigidly criticized, are habitually less than its whole yearly Public Expenditure, excepting only that portion which may be confidently trusted to produce a revenue at least sufficient to cover the interest on the excess of Public Debt which results from it.”

Now, this statement is so sound and clear that it is to be regretted that their subsequent statements seem to show that, as men of business, they are not aware how much more strictly that principle must be applied in future if they are to avoid insolvency; for they go on to treat as productive expenditure that which they themselves say, in paragraph 148, page 125—

“Cannot be expected within any time that can be foreseen to produce a profit equal to the interest upon it.”

And anybody who will cast his eye over the Paper circulated this morning—which I regret there has not been more time to consider—will see that among a great many of the undertakings treated as productive, and, therefore, as good assets, there are several which are not worth anything like the amount of capital which has been expended upon them. Now, I venture to think that this mode of account-keeping is just that which has brought the City of Glasgow Bank to its present position. They, like the Government of India, continued to value at its cost expenditure intended to be productive, but which had not proved so. Of course, I am not advocating a sudden reduction of expenditure, which might be politically dangerous, and very hard on the people of India. But what is absolutely necessary to prevent insolvency, is a much more careful investigation of the probable adequate return for expenditure. The expenditure now proposed of £2,000,000, if added to the Debt of India for works that are not, to use the words of the Government of India, sufficiently productive to cover the interest or the excess of Public Debt which they cause, must ultimately break down the finance of India; and it will be seen, on referring to page 12 of the Paper issued to-day, that the return in 1877-8 on the £18,000,000 expended during the last 10 years on State Railways does not yield quite $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent towards it; whereas the cost of money to the Government has been stated by them to be $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. A small part of the deficiency is, no doubt, due to incomplete undertakings; but it is evident that much of it is due to undertakings which will not, within any reasonable time, be remunerative; and when people point to the satisfactory improvements in the returns from guaranteed railways, it must be borne in mind that in the first instance, of course, English capitalists selected the large main lines, which were likely to be most productive, and that most of those that are left are those that are less promising. The Government of India should furnish us with a careful estimate of the probable return, within a reasonable time, of revenue from those so-called productive works; and such as are not likely to be productive within a reasonable time should no longer be treated as productive expenditure. Again, with respect to a remark made by the hon. Gentleman, that he would be sorry to reduce the expenditure on the Civil Service in India for fear of injuring the quality of the Service, of which he spoke with justifiable pride, I am satisfied, and so, I fear, are most of those who have studied the present position of affairs in this country, that the returns from trade and manufactures, and other occupations, are not likely to be on the same prosperous scale in the next 20 years that they have been in the last ; while, on the other hand, there will be a much larger supply, from the increased facilities for education, the best educated services. Therefore, the Government of India are likely to meet in future much less severe competition for the service of superior educated men of the best description than they have done in the past. A more moderate rate of remuneration and of superannuation will secure for the Government the high-class servants whom they have hitherto secured ; and, acting as they are for such a poor population as that of India, they are bound, while giving a fair, not to give a remuneration beyond that which is necessary to secure the services which they require ; and I am satisfied that there may be considerable reduction in this respect. There is another point on which I think the Government, acting for so poor a population as that of India, is bound to be very much more strict than it has hitherto been. I mean in dealing with capitalists. Now, it was an unjustifiable thing, for which, I believe, neither this nor the late Government were originally responsible—but I care not who is responsible for it—it was utterly unjustifiable to purchase the Orissa irrigation works, at the cost of the people of India, for £1,000,000, when the undertaking was unsaleable in the market at £600,000, besides giving, if I remember right, £70,000 to the officials of the Company, as what I can hardly characterize as anything but a bribe, for concluding with the Government an operation so disadvantageous to the country. And even in the East India Financial Statement of the 2nd of May, the Government seems to consider that it may be justifiable to give to capitalists, for work actually completed and done with, more than the strict letter of their contract entitles them to receive. When you look at the amount of English capital which is seeking investment, and the readiness—nay, the rashness—with which English capitalists seek investment that is likely to be profitable, it appears to me an improper thing to pay on account of the poor people of India to capitalists who were guaranteed against loss, and who have made very handsome profits, more than they are bound to pay. If it be contended that there is no great readiness on the part of English capitalists to invest capital in India, it must arise from one of two causes—either that this coddling system is really injuring instead of promoting enterprise in that direction, as, in fact, the system of Government aid has a tendency to do ; or the enterprising English capitalist does not find in these undertakings profitable employment for his capital. In that case, it ought to be a caution to the Government to be careful how they undertake operations which are thus shunned by private enterprise. Now, I know that people will sometimes point to the large increase in the exports from India as an indirect advantage, which must be taken into account ; but when these exports are stimulated by undertakings which can only be paid for out of the taxation of the people of India, they are not a benefit to them, but an evil. You are, in fact, doing the very thing that we blame the French Government for doing in the sugar bounties. If you promote the export of grain from India by carrying it to the ports by railways, which do not pay, but would have to be paid for out of taxation levied on the people of India, you certainly may cheapen the price of grain to the consumer in England and France, but it is at the cost of the poorer people of India ; and I do not know how far our agricultural friends will, any more than our sugar refiners, like competition in the supply of wheat thus artificially stimulated. There is only one other point which I think has not been sufficiently considered in its effect upon the Indian population. The silver question has been generally treated as if it had only one side to it. People speak of the depreciation of silver solely with the view to its effect upon the Debt of India, contracted to be paid in gold, and upon our trade with India and other countries with silver currency. Now, I am not going to trouble the House with a discussion as to whether it might be wise to introduce a bi-metallic currency. Nor am I prepared to deny that if the Government see their way clearly within a reasonable time to withdraw the sums they require from India at a more advantageous rate of exchange, they might not be wise to postpone the transfer of money from India ; but, unless they do see their way clearly to do this, I do say that any tampering with the exchange temporarily to raise the rate, at what may prove to be the cost of the people of India, would be a most unwise and improper thing. It must be borne in mind that the working population of India are large debtors of sums to be paid in silver, and that the cheapness of silver must have diminished enormously to them the pressure of the evils which they have recently been suffering under. The ryot in India has to pay the money-lender in silver, and the zemindar in silver for the rent of his land. Had the trade been in its ordinary state, the effect of the depreciation of silver would have been largely to raise the rupee value of the produce of his labour and of his land. Owing to the very bad state of trade, it has not taken this form, but it must have prevented enormously the depreciation of the value of the produce he had to sell, and of the value of his labour; and you have no right, at the risk of its being at his cost, artificially to raise the value of the sums which he has contracted to pay in silver. When gold was discovered in California and Australia, we did not find that the abundance of the metal which formed the basis of the circulation of this country was injurious to us. On the contrary, it greatly stimulated the prosperity of this country; and why should not a similar cause produce a similar effect in India? The Government of India require to be very much on their guard in viewing this question, because, of course, the whole Civil Service of India, and the whole mercantile community, have a decided interest in this matter antagonistic to the interests of the people of India; and it is most difficult, therefore, for the Government to hold the balance even where most of their advisers are deeply interested on one side of the question. The Under Secretary of State for India, at the close of his speech, spoke of the greatness of the task we have undertaken in the government of the millions of India. Not only is it a great task, it is a greater task than has ever been successfully accomplished by any nation which has borne Imperial sway over other countries. The hon. Member is, as we all hope and believe, on the threshold of an eminent career; and I venture to think he could set before himself no nobler undertaking than that of thoroughly mastering and bringing home to the people of this country the enormous responsibilities they have undertaken, and the enormous difficulties of the task of making out of those millions of poor people of India a nation, not merely of well-fed beings, but of industrious, intelligent, self-reliant men.

MR. GOSCHEN: The state of the Indian exchanges and the price of silver play so important a part in the discussions of Indian finance that I feel I need make little apology if I confine my remarks on this occasion exclusively to this one topic. Other parts of the Indian Budget command the very greatest interest, and it is no want of appreciation of other most weighty matters which induces me to speak of the question of exchanges alone to-night. I shall confine myself to this one topic, because it is in itself so wide that it would scarcely leave me at liberty to dilate on other matters. And, in the first place, let me express my satisfaction that, on this occasion, the question of exchanges has not been discussed simply on the basis of the loss of so many millions sterling, but that the much more important bearing which it has on the population of India has not been lost sight of. I am afraid that heretofore the whole subject has been too much looked upon through European spectacles, and with reference to the difficulty which is so painfully apparent to those who have to receive payments in silver on which they sustained a loss when they convert it into gold. Heretofore, it seems to have been almost forgotten that the internal transactions of India must be considered as much as its external trade.

Now, I purposely made a distinction between "the state of the exchanges" and "the price of silver." They are two separate, though connected, facts. The state of the exchanges may be very unsatisfactory, while the condition of the silver market may have a very different effect upon the condition of India generally. Is it so absolutely clear that the depreciation of silver is a calamity to countries with a silver currency? It has, at all events, never been explained why the flood of silver into India must have such disastrous effects, while the influx of gold into England, after the discovery in Australia, was hailed as a fertilizing stream. Gold was depreciated, but trade was said to be stimulated thereby. Silver is depreciated in India, and why should we there expect a contrary effect. Again, let me say that the question must be looked upon from the Indian point of view, and not to so great an extent, as has been usually the case, from a European stand-point. The hon. Member for Bolton (Mr. J. K. Cross), in his able and most lucid speech, has rendered the greatest service in drawing attention to this duty.

[Third Night.]

I am not sure whether the House generally has sufficiently observed that we have escaped a very great danger. It will remember the statement which was made by the Under Secretary of State for India when he opened the debate, that proposals had been made by the Indian Government which had been disallowed by the Government at home. The danger which we have escaped is this—It was intended artificially to raise the value of the coined rupee. It must not be forgotten what the currency of India is. Indeed, I have been tempted to ask myself whether it has not become necessary to repeat in another form the famous question of Sir Robert Peel, and say, not “What is a pound?” but “What is a rupee?” A rupee is a coin containing 165 grains of silver and 15 grains of alloy. At the old price of silver, when the porportion between gold and silver was as $15\frac{1}{2}$ to 1, these 165 grains of silver were worth about 1s. $10\frac{1}{2}d$. Their present worth is about 1s. $8d$. That is the simple account of the rupee; but it must not be forgotten that in India bars of silver, in unlimited quantities, may be brought to the Mint to be coined, and coin obtained in exchange; and, just as in this country, the currency is co-extensive with the amount of gold which those who have anything to sell are able to obtain in return for their goods, so the currency of India is co-extensive with the power of India for procuring silver by the means of selling goods. It is an unlimited silver currency; and it is on the basis of that silver currency that all contracts have been made in India. If any measure were adopted to close the Mint upon silver, the privilege would be taken away from debtors of paying their debts through the medium of the coinage of silver bars; and it would compel all debtors to apply to those who have coined rupees to sell. Now, the great sellers of rupees are the Indian Government. The Indian Government have £15,000,000 worth of coined rupees to sell every year. It would certainly be an ingenious plan, if it were proposed that as the Government could not sell coined rupees with advantage under the present system, they had better suspend any fresh coinage of silver altogether. Such a step would raise the value of the coined rupee, it would raise the price of the lowest drafts; it might save the Government from heavy loss. But such a course would, practically, be equivalent to sweeping away, in an arbitrary manner, the supply of silver for circulation in India. Any measure thus designed artificially to raise the value of the rupee would disturb the whole of the internal transactions of India; and, clearly, we must be careful, lest in our attempts to save the Government from financial loss, we do injustice to the population over which they rule.

But other evils are alleged besides the loss to the Government from the sale of their bills; for instance, the violent fluctuations in the exchanges, the instability of the price of silver—elements of uncertainty said to paralyze trade. No doubt, these violent fluctuations have been disastrous to many, and have been a great trial to the whole Indian trade. We have passed through a period which has been viewed by all merchants trading with India with regret and alarm. And I do not wish to minimize these causes for regret, if, on the other hand, I call attention to the fact that this country has continually done a prosperous business with countries subjected to no less violent fluctuation in their exchanges. Look at the trade with the United States when gold was at an immense, but ever-varying premium. Look at the Russian exchanges, utterly without stability; at the Austrian exchanges. Yet England has always done good business with such countries, nevertheless. There is nothing new in disturbances of trade through fluctuations in exchange; and surely we must be exceedingly careful to avoid being tempted by such a difficulty to have recourse to empirical remedies. I am glad to find that empirical remedies have been repudiated in so many quarters of this House. Again, as regards actual loss by the fall in the price of silver. No doubt, there has been a loss for many besides the Government. But it is very important to realize who are the losers. The hon. Member for Bolton has alluded to the various classes; but it is worth while to make this very clear. Those likely to lose, in the first instance, are such as receive their income in rupees and have to remit a portion to their families in Europe. Most Indian officials belong to this class; but many persons besides may have to make remittances to Europe out of an income measured in rupees. Then there are the great banks trading with India. Many of them are in this position—they have taken deposits in England and Scotland in gold, or in £1 notes, and have lent the money out in India. They cannot bring silver home without experiencing a serious loss. When events occur, such as the breaking of the City of Glasgow Bank, an event which affected very distinctly the commerce of India, many of the Eastern banks might find it expedient to bring money home from India to strengthen their position. Such remittances could not be managed without considerable loss. Then there are the manufacturers who have exported goods to India. The value of those goods is due in rupees. The value of the silver in the rupee falls, and when exchanged for gold gives a worse price for the goods. Of the loss of the Government I need not speak again. There are the classes who suffer, or have suffered, by the fall of silver, and every credit should be given to the Government for having withstood the pressure of them all—the class of officials, the class of traders to India, the banks, and, above all, their own interests in connection with the sale of their bills. I believe we have escaped a real danger by the Government refusing proposals of which the full scope, I am sure, has never been thought out. To judge of these proposals it was necessary to recall the classes in whose favour they were made; but to judge properly of any remedies, let us be sure that we thoroughly understand the causes of the evils we wish to meet. How far are they temporary or permanent? How far are they natural or dependent on legislation?

Now, we have frequently heard that the excessive production of America has been the real cause for alarm; and I saw it recently stated that, compared with the production in America, the sale of the German silver could not be supposed to have had a material effect. I will examine the extent of these respective causes. I readily believe that the production of silver in America has had a great effect on the minds of the dealers in silver; but it has been rather an effect on the mind which has been witnessed, than any excessive supplies of the metal itself. What are the figures with regard to these supplies from the United States? It is really startling, after the discoveries of the mines of Nevada, to look at the facts with regard to the amount of silver which has actually come to England. From 1871 to 1874, England imported in silver from the United States, £21,730,000, or, on an average, £5,000,000 a-year. From 1875 to 1878 the total net imports have been £8,200,000, or an average of about £2,000,000 a-year. The amounts in the years 1875-6-7-8, were respectively £3,090,000, £2,257,000, £2,315,000, and £532,000. In this last year, which exhibited the lowest amount, the gross imports were £1,615,000; but £1,083,000 was actually sent from the United Kingdom to the United States, leaving a balance imported from the United States of little more than £500,000. The significance of these figures is unquestionable. It is true, on the other hand, that a certain amount of silver went direct from the United States to Japan and China; but, nevertheless, an examination of the documents presented to the House show that the exports of silver from America have been less during the last few years than they were before. On the other hand, I observe, and the fact should not be neglected, that in the first five months of this year there has been an increase, as compared with former years, in the amount coming from the United States; and I particularly wish to state this fact, as I am anxious to avoid producing any bias in the minds of anyone with regard to the future course of the silver market. What I feel bound to do, after all that has been said about the production of the United States, is to call attention to the remarkable figures which I have quoted. Let me go back for one moment to the Committee of which I was Chairman in 1876. We expected that the production of the year 1876-7 would be £9,000,000. It turned out to be £7,000,000; but in the following year it was £9,000,000. Hon. Members have doubtless seen, with regard to the most recent dates, statements in the public papers on the subject of the scale of the production of the Comstock Lode, and those extraordinary mines which in 1876 excited so much attention. It appears that in the present year the produce of these mines is distinctly decreasing; but I have no special information upon this part of the case. What I have wished to bring to the notice of the House is this, that hitherto—though it may not continue to be the case—notwithstanding the large production in the United States, very small supplies have come to these shores. The main part of the produce of the United States silver mines has been used for coinage purposes in the United States themselves; but if production in these mines continues on the scale which we have witnessed hitherto, I should think it very doubtful whether the United States will be able to continue to use all the silver they produce, and, if not, it is clear that exports may re-commence on a large scale.

[Third Night.]

I now turn to Germany, where the situation has been exceedingly remarkable, and I will place such facts as are in my possession before the House. I wish that more facts were known and accessible to the public. The German Government has been exceedingly reticent. It has been most difficult to extract anything from them; and, to my mind, they have pursued a short-sighted policy in supplying as little information as they possibly could. They have doubtless done so in the vain hope of preventing speculators acting against them; but the result has been constant alarm, much of which might possibly have been avoided if the truth had been told. There has been no reticence on the part of any other Government. At the Conference held in Paris, and in which I took a part, Representatives of nearly all the Governments of Europe were perfectly open, both as regarded information on the position of silver in their countries, and as regarded the policy of their respective Governments. But the German Government refused to be represented, even though they were assured that nothing would be asked from their Representatives beyond a statement of facts, and that in no other way would they be compromised. The absence of full and authentic information with regard to the silver question in the German Empire seems to me a public misfortune.

I will now proceed to state to the House the progress of the demonetization of silver in Germany, and the sale of their silver, so far as it can be ascertained. The total coinage in Germany before the late reforms was about £90,000,000. It was estimated that possibly one-third of the existing coinage might have vanished—that is to say, £30,000,000—which, deducted from the £90,000,000, would have left a total of £60,000,000 to deal with. An amount of about £20,000,000 was required for re-coinage, leaving £40,000,000 for sale. Of this amount £6,000,000 had been sold at the time when the Committee on the Depreciation of Silver sat in 1876, so that there remained about £34,000,000 which might come upon the market. This, however, was at that time considered quite a maximum estimate. The Committee, after a most careful inquiry and examination of the various estimates submitted to them, stated that those estimates ranged between £8,000,000 and £30,000,000. But what has been the result? Since that date the German Government have actually sold £26,000,000, which, added to the £6,000,000 sold before, makes a total of £32,000,000 already sold by the German Government. These are stupendous figures as compared with the £2,000,000 per annum which we have received latterly from the United States. But the more interesting question is, what has the German Government still got to sell? On the estimate that after provision for re-coinage had been made, there remained £40,000,000 to sell, as £32,000,000 have been already sold, there would only remain £8,000,000. But what is stated now? Reference has already been made by the hon. Member for Bolton to the letter from Lord Odo Russell, in which it is said that the German Government has £10,000,000 for sale, and that the amount is likely to be increased by the one-thaler pieces not yet withdrawn. The hon. Member for Bolton is unable to understand this figure, as, considering the very large amount of one-thaler pieces still in circulation, and considering the official documents presented to the German Parliament at the beginning of this year, it is difficult to make this statement of Lord Odo Russell's informant square with the other facts. Now, those facts appear to be these. An official publication submitted to the German Parliament stated that about 7,000,000 lbs., withdrawn from circulation, had been sold or prepared for sale, and that there remained about 380,000 lbs., a sum which I presume would be worth about £1,700,000. The same document estimated that there might be in circulation, after making the deductions for coins which had vanished in the course of time, about 117,000,000 thalers, a sum equivalent to about £17,500,000. This memorandum would, therefore, show that at the beginning of the year there was in stock, ready for sale, silver to the amount of about £1,700,000, and thaler pieces which might be called in, but which were still circulating, to the amount of £17,500,000. An examination of the published figures had led it to be generally supposed that the amount of silver which would probably come upon the market would not be more than from £12,000,000 to £14,000,000. But I can now state that I have received a letter from a high authority in Berlin, informing me that the Government have £10,000,000 in ingots in their hands for sale, and this without making any deduction in the estimate of the thalers still in circulation. This confirms the statement of Lord Odo Russell; so that, on the one hand, we have the official documents showing that the Government had about £1,700,000 for sale at the beginning of the year; and, on the other hand, the statement that they have £10,000,000 in ingots for sale. I can only see one possible explanation of the apparent discrepancy. I have been informed that of the large amount of thaler pieces in circulation, 60,000,000 are in the hands of the Imperial Bank. This is equal to a sum of £9,000,000; and this, with about £1,700,000 in ingots—since reduced by some sales—which the Government admitted to have in their hands at the beginning of the year, would give about £10,000,000 which they could sell at any time they pleased. But in this case, of course, the 60,000,000 thalers—equal to £9,000,000—would be deducted from the thaler pieces in circulation. However, I only put this as a speculative explanation, and I hope Her Majesty's Government may be able to clear up the question.

Mr. Goschen

One thing is perfectly certain—there is a considerable amount of silver still in Germany, and the question is, what are the German Government going to do? I have received a very distinct and categorical assurance from a high authority that the German Government do not intend to make any further sales of silver. One reason probably is that they have pitched at too low a figure the requirements of the German nation with regard to the small coinage. They have fixed it at 10s. per head, and, I believe, in doing so, they have been influenced by the amount of shillings per head which experience has shown to be necessary in England. But it does not follow that if this amount is sufficient in one country, it is, therefore, sufficient in another. The differences in the social habits of various countries produce differences in the amount of subsidiary coin required. For instance, in this country, the use of cheques limits the requirements of small coin; and, again, the system of paying tradesmen's books every week or every month economizes the use of silver to a great degree, as compared with the German system of marketing for cash almost every day. It is, therefore, perfectly intelligible that the 10s. per head may not be an adequate sum for German requirements. I believe I may add that I shall be correct in saying that the Germans do not think that they have made a particularly good bargain by the transfer of their old gold currency into the new currency, and that there has been possibly some hesitation in Berlin as to whether, all other silver coins having been called in, they should further call in and demonetize the old one-thaler piece which is still in circulation. Certainly, it is possible that we may be approaching the end of the crisis in the silver market which has been produced by Germany.

There remains one serious matter to be considered, to which allusion has already been made, and that is the question of the power of India to absorb silver. This is the only point with respect to which I find myself unable to agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, who seemed to doubt the capacity of India for such absorption. For what are the facts? What does the House suppose has been the amount of silver actually imported into India since the Report of the Committee of 1876 appeared? In the year 1876-7 the net import of silver into India was £7,200,000; in 1877-8, £14,700,000; and in 1878-9, £3,970,000; or more than £25,000,000 sterling in three years. Going back to 1870-1, I find that the net import was only £940,000; in 1871-2, £6,500,000; in 1872-3, £705,000; in 1873-4, £2,450,000; in 1874-5, £4,600,000; in 1875-6, £1,600,000. It will be seen, then, that in the three years previous to the last three years, the total imports of silver into India were only £8,500,000; while, during the last three years, they amounted to £25,000,000. Now, what may appear astonishing at first sight, but not at second sight, and what may interest those who are interested in statistical curiosities, is this—that £26,000,000 worth of silver was precisely the amount which has been sold by the German Government during the period in which India has taken the £25,000,000; so that India has been able to absorb, or compelled to absorb, almost the whole of the amount which has been sold by Germany. It is possible, of course, that a large amount of silver may have been remitted from England to India, and may still be held there on English account; but, on the other hand, it is quite as possible that there has been some withdrawal of capital from India to this country, in consequence of the panic created by the fall in exchanges. I think I ought to add that the gross amount of silver imported into India during the last three years has been £30,000,000; and nearly the whole of the £5,000,000, the difference between that sum and the £25,000,000 which I named before, has been distributed over China, Japan, and other silver-using countries, a portion of it having been sent to Ceylon. It has, in fact, been taken by the East.

[Third Night.]

Now, I wish to know whether, looking at the question as it ought to be looked at—from a broad point of view—the House will think it necessary to stop the operation of natural causes by arresting their action in favour of dangerous remedies? The course of nature has been carrying the silver of Germany into India and the East. Let me call the attention of the House to one circumstance. In 1876, we—the Committee who sat on the depreciation of silver—examined most minutely into the whole facts of the case. The information which we received with regard to facts has, in many instances, turned out misleading and inaccurate, while the deductions which we made from the natural laws of political economy have proved in all respects to be correct. The late Mr. Bagehot, that eminent economist, whose loss we all deplore as a calamity to the country, placed all the circumstances of the case before the Committee with prophetic instinct, or rather, I should say, not with instinct, but with science; and he explained how it was a mathematical certainty that Asia must continue to absorb silver to an unlimited extent. The Committee recognized that, owing to the immense increase in the Council drafts, India would have to take either less silver, or less commodities. They also saw that only £1,500,000 had been sent from England to India in the year previous to that in which they were appointed. Nevertheless, it seemed to them a matter capable of absolute demonstration that this was only a temporary circumstance, and that the natural correction to the fall of silver was its distribution over those vast areas where its price could but slowly subside. The result has proved the entire correctness of the forecast.

I have shown how silver has poured into India, and has stayed there. There may be, at this moment, a temporary cessation of the demand—but that is not to the point. The question ought not to be looked at from month to month; but as there has been a flow of silver into India, so silver will continue to flow. As long as the Mints in India are left open, every bar of silver in London represents, if I may use the expression, so many potential rupees. So long as a bar of silver in India will purchase any commodities, so long as silver remains a legal tender, and so long as the Mints are open to silver, the market must be sustained as long as India and the East retain any purchasing power whatever. I could easily illustrate to the House how India could be compelled to take silver; and it is, too, an absolutely incontrovertible proposition that the low price of silver must stimulate her exports, while it discourages her imports. I can give the simplest possible illustration of the way in which exports are stimulated. Suppose a man to have £2, with which he desires to buy a quarter of wheat. Before the fall in silver, those £2 might have been turned into about 20 rupees for purchase of wheat at Bombay, and into $5 for purchase in the United States. With those $5, or with those rupees, he would, subject to differences of quality, or of cost of transport, have been able to buy, let us say a quarter of wheat, either in New York or in Bombay. But the price of silver has fallen, and the £2 will now realize 25 rupees instead of 20. It is assumed that prices in India have not risen. Whether that proposition is tenable, I will not at the moment discuss; but this assumption lies at the root of all the remedies that have been proposed. Well, if the price of wheat has not risen at Bombay, the buyer would still be able to buy the quarter of wheat as before with his 20 rupees, as he would still be able to buy a quarter of wheat for his $5 in the United States; but his £2 have given him 25 rupees; consequently, he has 5 rupees over, if he buys in India, as compared with buying in the United States—a state of things which, under the laws of competition, must at once correct itself. A competitor would be content with a profit of 4 rupees, and would give 21 rupees for the quarter of wheat. Another competitor would raise his bid to 22 rupees, and still be better off than buying elsewhere. These competitors will either give more gold for silver—that is to say, silver would rise—or else they would give more rupees for the wheat—that is to say, prices would rise in India—and exporters and producers gain. This is one illustration of the natural laws which, in my judgment, will ultimately supply a remedy for the present situation.

But artificial and immediate remedies are suggested, which would, in fact, counteract and absolutely neutralize the natural remedies. Some persons, frightened at the absence of a temporary demand for silver, proposed to introduce a gold currency in its place. Nothing could be a greater mistake. Look at the enormous silver currency of India, and consider what would become of it. It is said that a portion of the silver would have to be sold; but who is to buy it? Those who recommend this plan continually forget the difficulty of finding a buyer. If, after the steps which some nations have already taken in Europe to introduce gold instead of silver into their currencies, India were to be added to the number of countries who were sellers, instead of purchasers, of silver, what country could possibly be expected to buy the surplus stock thus thrown upon the market? It is clear there would be no buyers for such vast amounts.

But, again, what does the introduction of a gold currency into India imply? It means that gold, which, it has been said, has now been appreciated in value in Europe, is to be still further appreciated by being introduced into a country where the great bulk of the population do not wish to use it at all. Of all the schemes which have been suggested, this seems to me to be the one of which it is most difficult to follow the reasoning. To send gold to India just at the time when it is almost inconveniently appreciated in Europe, is to expose India to the evils of an appreciated currency in order to rescue her from the misfortunes of depreciation. The one evil might prove to be greater than the other. I object, then, to any plan that would shut the door to silver, by substituting a gold currency. In my view, the rectification of the market ought to be brought about by the natural flow of silver over its natural area, and that area is the East.

But consider a further argument. I believe that it is for the interest of commerce generally, not only in India, but in Europe, that the great aggregate of the world's commercial transactions should be based upon silver and gold together, rather than that it should rest upon gold alone. Monometallists make a great mistake when they endeavour to convert all nations to the use of gold only. They allow the argument of uniformity to outweigh the argument that these variations are more likely to occur upon the small quantity of gold than upon the larger aggregate quantity of gold and silver together. Look at the historical relations of the two metals from the earliest times. I hold it to be a wrong policy to attempt to dethrone silver where silver still reigns supreme. But let me not be misunderstood. I am in favour of gold and silver being left to continue to perform the aggregate work of currency together; but it is a perfectly different thing to say, as the bimetallicists say, that those countries which have a gold currency now ought to supply themselves with a silver currency as well.

But here is another difficulty as regards the introduction of a gold currency into India. At what proportion ought you to start? Is the new currency to be introduced into India at the old rate of 1s. 10½d., or at the present rate of 1s. 8d?

[Third Night.]

The difference is enormous. The one alternative would entail a vast amount of injury in the case of contracts, and be ruinous to debtors; the other would involve enormous loss to the Treasury. For my part, I urge the Government to do nothing until they are quite certain that the abnormal and temporary causes have been exhausted and have disappeared, and they have only natural causes to deal with.

I have heard of other ingenious combinations, which aim neither at maintaining a silver currency nor at establishing a gold currency, at least for the present; but which propose to put into the hands of the Government powers by which, from time to time, they would regulate the exchanges by limiting the currency. On behalf of mercantile interests, I entirely demur to placing such a power in the hands of Lord Lytton, or Sir John Strachey, or any other Indian Viceroy or Financial Secretary. I prefer the vagaries of the precious metals to the vagaries of Legislative Councils. Or, is silver, as some suppose, to be only a "limited legal tender in India?" Remember the ignorant masses of India. Let the House call to mind how, in the case of Scotland, it would create almost a revolution, if we were to attempt to abolish the £1 note. Populations cling with the greatest tenacity to the currency to which they have been accustomed—and can we mean to try an immense experiment of this kind upon the Native population of India? Fancy introducing into India a "limited legal tender!" It might, indeed, be even difficult to translate the phrase into Hindustani—but what suspicion and distrust might such an arrangement not produce? The labourer would receive his wages in silver; and, when he took his coins to make payment of rent or of taxes, he would be told that they could not be received, as they were only "limited legal tender." To try such an experiment with an uncivilized population would surely be as absurd as it would be dangerous.

If I am asked myself what I would do under the circumstances, I would distinctly reply, in the first instance, that I would leave natural causes alone. I would leave them to work out their own effect to the full; and, when the temporary and abnormal causes were exhausted, if I then saw that natural causes still left the situation such as to create embarrassment in the Budgets of India, owing to the fall in the value of the coin in which taxes were paid, coupled with the obligation to make large payments in gold, I should then consider it to be the duty of the Indian Government to look thoroughly into their receipts and expenditure, to revise the system, and to adjust it to the altered price of the rupee—for a new price there would certainly be. The final depreciation of silver must mean a rise in the price of commodities which that silver is to buy. Let the House remember the illustration of the hon. Member for Bolton (Mr. J. K. Cross) as regards the opium sales. Let me give another illustration. The Home charges include interest for the guaranteed railways to the amount of about £4,500,000. If silver settles down at a price showing a great depreciation, and a general rise in prices, then it would be perfectly just to raise the tariffs of the railways in proportion to the increase in price of other commodities; and, by such a revision, the Government would gain in one way what they lost by the payment of the interest in gold. I give this merely as an illustration of the mode in which expenditure would have to be revised. But, however this may be, whatever financial measures it may be necessary to take with a view to establishing a financial equilibrium, I deprecate measures which would tamper with the currency of India, which would tend still further to depreciate silver, and to close the avenues to its use, and that at a crisis when we should rather see how we could further open the door to silver in the East, where, from the remotest times, it has always been required; and I deprecate also, in the strongest manner, measures which would leave the management of the exchanges in the hands of any Government. I am glad to congratulate Her Majesty's Ministers for having had the firmness to resist the proposals of the Indian Government on the subject of the currency—proposals which ought never to have been made.

MR. BALFOUR, as a Member of the Departmental Committee which had sat to consider the proposal of the Government of India with respect to the currency, wished to say a few words on that subject. It was clear, then, in the first place, that all the schemes which had been proposed as remedies for the evils which had been referred to, and especially that of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe), were based on an artificial, instead of a natural currency in India. They attempted to establish a currency whose value should depend, not on natural causes, but on the action of the Government; and they ran counter, therefore, to the opinion of all the authorities on the question who were of the least weight. It was only on grounds of the utmost gravity that the principle of a natural currency should be departed from, and then only when it was conclusively shown that the remedy would completely cure the evil sought to be removed. Now, what was this evil? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London had said that it consisted in extracting from an impoverished population an extra £3,000,000—the £3,000,000, namely, which were required to make up the difference between the number of rupees required to pay the Home charges when the rupee was at 2s., and the number required when the rupee was at 1s. 7d. If it was true that the Indian taxpayer would, in the long run, have to pay this additional charge, no doubt, any scheme which, in the long run, promised to relieve him of it would deserve respectful consideration. But it was a mistake to suppose that any fall in the value of the rupee could have such an effect. The burden which taxation in any country threw on the taxpayer might be estimated—could, indeed, only be estimated—by the proportion of the produce of his toil which he had to hand over to the Government. The fact that more rupees were required (owing to the fall in silver) to pay the gold debt, did not in the least show that more of such produce was required to pay that debt, and did not consequently show that the Indian taxpayer would have to undergo more sacrifices in order to meet his liabilities. It was true that he would have to pay more rupees; but the very circumstances which produced this state of things would provide him with more rupees wherewith to pay. He maintained that as long as the products of India retained their existing ratio in relation to gold, it was impossible that the taxpayers of India could suffer by a depreciation in the value of the silver coinage. On the contrary, he maintained that the fall in the value of silver would lighten, instead of increasing, the burdens of the taxpayer of India, because India had a silver debt; and while the loss on the gold debt would in the long run be only nominal, the gain on the silver debt would be real and substantial. He would not, however, under-rate the great difficulties which the present state of things threw on the Government of India. Those difficulties were extremely grave, but they were only administrative difficulties. They embarrassed the Indian Government, because they compelled it to alter the incidence of taxation, and to re-distribute its taxes. Moreover, a great amount of uncertainty was thrown into all anticipations of Revenue, and it was impossible to frame a Budget that could be depended on. He was not surprised, therefore, that every Indian financier should grasp at any remedy for such a state of things. But every historical example of a currency artificially managed, and in the hands of a Government, showed that a currency of this kind was subject to fluctuations of an extremely violent character. If, then, the object of the Indian Government was to obtain certainty in their calculations, that object would not be attained by adopting a currency depending on the caprice of men rather than on natural causes. Considering, therefore, that the evils to be remedied were by no means of the serious kind sometimes imagined, and also that such evils as existed would probably not be remedied by any interference with the currency, he thought that Her Majesty's Government had done wisely in rejecting any scheme of the kind, whether it was that proposed by the Indian Government, or that proposed by the right hon. Member for the University of London. Turning now from the question of the exchanges to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), he observed that though this was full of gloomy anticipations, yet that the only part of it in which he understood the right hon. Gentleman to have attacked the financial policy of the Government was that which related to the cotton duties. He had listened to the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman on that point with extreme surprise. The right hon. Gentleman indignantly asked "What sort of country it was

[Third Night.]

The difference is enormous. The one alternative would entail a vast amount of injury in the case of contracts, and be ruinous to debtors; the other would involve enormous loss to the Treasury. For my part, I urge the Government to do nothing until they are quite certain that the abnormal and temporary causes have been exhausted and have disappeared, and they have only natural causes to deal with.

I have heard of other ingenious combinations, which aim neither at maintaining a silver currency nor at establishing a gold currency, at least for the present; but which propose to put into the hands of the Government powers by which, from time to time, they would regulate the exchanges by limiting the currency. On behalf of mercantile interests, I entirely demur to placing such a power in the hands of Lord Lytton, or Sir John Strachey, or any other Indian Viceroy or Financial Secretary. I prefer the vagaries of the precious metals to the vagaries of Legislative Councils. Or, is silver, as some suppose, to be only a "limited legal tender in India?" Remember the ignorant masses of India. Let the House call to mind how, in the case of Scotland, it would create almost a revolution, if we were to attempt to abolish the £1 note. Populations cling with the greatest tenacity to the currency to which they have been accustomed—and can we mean to try an immense experiment of this kind upon the Native population of India? Fancy introducing into India a "limited legal tender!" It might, indeed, be even difficult to translate the phrase into Hindustani—but what suspicion and distrust might such an arrangement not produce? The labourer would receive his wages in silver; and, when he took his coins to make payment of rent or of taxes, he would be told that they could not be received, as they were only "limited legal tender." To try such an experiment with an uncivilized population would surely be as absurd as it would be dangerous.

If I am asked myself what I would do under the circumstances, I would distinctly reply, in the first instance, that I would leave natural causes alone. I would leave them to work out their own effect to the full; and, when the temporary and abnormal causes were exhausted, if I then saw that natural causes still left the situation such as to create embarrassment in the Budgets of India, owing to the fall in the value of the coin in which taxes were paid, coupled with the obligation to make large payments in gold, I should then consider it to be the duty of the Indian Government to look thoroughly into their receipts and expenditure, to revise the system, and to adjust it to the altered price of the rupee—for a new price there would certainly be. The final depreciation of silver must mean a rise in the price of commodities which that silver is to buy. Let the House remember the illustration of the hon. Member for Bolton (Mr. J. K. Cross) as regards the opium sales. Let me give another illustration. The Home charges include interest for the guaranteed railways to the amount of about £4,500,000. If silver settles down at a price showing a great depreciation, and a general rise in prices, then it would be perfectly just to raise the tariffs of the railways in proportion to the increase in price of other commodities; and, by such a revision, the Government would gain in one way what they lost by the payment of the interest in gold. I give this merely as an illustration of the mode in which expenditure would have to be revised. But, however this may be, whatever financial measures it may be necessary to take with a view to establishing a financial equilibrium, I deprecate measures which would tamper with the currency of India, which would tend still further to depreciate silver, and to close the avenues to its use, and that at a crisis when we should rather see how we could further open the door to silver in the East, where, from the remotest times, it has always been required; and I deprecate also, in the strongest manner, measures which would leave the management of the exchanges in the hands of any Government. I am glad to congratulate Her Majesty's Ministers for having had the firmness to resist the proposals of the Indian Government on the subject of the currency—proposals which ought never to have been made.

MR. BALFOUR, as a Member of the Departmental Committee which had sat to consider the proposal of the Government of India with respect to the currency, wished to say a few words on that subject. It was clear, then, in the first place, that all the schemes which had been proposed as remedies for the evils which had been referred to, and especially that of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe), were based on an artificial, instead of a natural currency in India. They attempted to establish a currency whose value should depend, not on natural causes, but on the action of the Government; and they ran counter, therefore, to the opinion of all the authorities on the question who were of the least weight. It was only on grounds of the utmost gravity that the principle of a natural currency should be departed from, and then only when it was conclusively shown that the remedy would completely cure the evil sought to be removed. Now, what was this evil? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London had said that it consisted in extracting from an impoverished population an extra £3,000,000—the £3,000,000, namely, which were required to make up the difference between the number of rupees required to pay the Home charges when the rupee was at 2s., and the number required when the rupee was at 1s. 7d. If it was true that the Indian taxpayer would, in the long run, have to pay this additional charge, no doubt, any scheme which, in the long run, promised to relieve him of it would deserve respectful consideration. But it was a mistake to suppose that any fall in the value of the rupee could have such an effect. The burden which taxation in any country threw on the taxpayer might be estimated—could, indeed, only be estimated—by the proportion of the produce of his toil which he had to hand over to the Government. The fact that more rupees were required (owing to the fall in silver) to pay the gold debt, did not in the least show that more of such produce was required to pay that debt, and did not consequently show that the Indian taxpayer would have to undergo more sacrifices in order to meet his liabilities. It was true that he would have to pay more rupees; but the very circumstances which produced this state of things would provide him with more rupees wherewith to pay. He maintained that as long as the products of India retained their existing ratio in relation to gold, it was impossible that the taxpayers of India could suffer by a depreciation in the value of the silver coinage. On the contrary, he maintained that the fall in the value of silver would lighten, instead of increasing, the burdens of the taxpayer of India, because India had a silver debt; and while the loss on the gold debt would in the long run be only nominal, the gain on the silver debt would be real and substantial. He would not, however, under-rate the great difficulties which the present state of things threw on the Government of India. Those difficulties were extremely grave, but they were only administrative difficulties. They embarrassed the Indian Government, because they compelled it to alter the incidence of taxation, and to re-distribute its taxes. Moreover, a great amount of uncertainty was thrown into all anticipations of Revenue, and it was impossible to frame a Budget that could be depended on. He was not surprised, therefore, that every Indian financier should grasp at any remedy for such a state of things. But every historical example of a currency artificially managed, and in the hands of a Government, showed that a currency of this kind was subject to fluctuations of an extremely violent character. If, then, the object of the Indian Government was to obtain certainty in their calculations, that object would not be attained by adopting a currency depending on the caprice of men rather than on natural causes. Considering, therefore, that the evils to be remedied were by no means of the serious kind sometimes imagined, and also that such evils as existed would probably not be remedied by any interference with the currency, he thought that Her Majesty's Government had done wisely in rejecting any scheme of the kind, whether it was that proposed by the Indian Government, or that proposed by the right hon. Member for the University of London. Turning now from the question of the exchanges to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), he observed that though this was full of gloomy anticipations, yet that the only part of it in which he understood the right hon. Gentleman to have attacked the financial policy of the Government was that which related to the cotton duties. He had listened to the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman on that point with extreme surprise. The right hon. Gentleman indignantly asked "What sort of country it was

Mr. Goschen

[Third Night.]

The difference is enormous. The one alternative would entail a vast amount of injury in the case of contracts, and be ruinous to debtors; the other would involve enormous loss to the Treasury. For my part, I urge the Government to do nothing until they are quite certain that the abnormal and temporary causes have been exhausted and have disappeared, and they have only natural causes to deal with.

I have heard of other ingenious combinations, which aim neither at maintaining a silver currency nor at establishing a gold currency, at least for the present; but which propose to put into the hands of the Government powers by which, from time to time, they would regulate the exchanges by limiting the currency. On behalf of mercantile interests, I entirely demur to placing such a power in the hands of Lord Lytton, or Sir John Strachey, or any other Indian Viceroy or Financial Secretary. I prefer the vagaries of the precious metals to the vagaries of Legislative Councils. Or, is silver, as some suppose, to be only a "limited legal tender in India?" Remember the ignorant masses of India. Let the House call to mind how, in the case of Scotland, it would create almost a revolution, if we were to attempt to abolish the £1 note. Populations cling with the greatest tenacity to the currency to which they have been accustomed—and can we mean to try an immense experiment of this kind upon the Native population of India? Fancy introducing into India a "limited legal tender!" It might, indeed, be even difficult to translate the phrase into Hindustani—but what suspicion and distrust might such an arrangement not produce? The labourer would receive his wages in silver; and, when he took his coins to make payment of rent or of taxes, he would be told that they could not be received, as they were only "limited legal tender." To try such an experiment with an uncivilized population would surely be as absurd as it would be dangerous.

If I am asked myself what I would do under the circumstances, I would distinctly reply, in the first instance, that I would leave natural causes alone. I would leave them to work out their own effect to the full; and, when the temporary and abnormal causes were exhausted, if I then saw that natural causes still left the situation such as to create embarrassment in the Budgets of India, owing to the fall in the value of the coin in which taxes were paid, coupled with the obligation to make large payments in gold, I should then consider it to be the duty of the Indian Government to look thoroughly into their receipts and expenditure, to revise the system, and to adjust it to the altered price of the rupee—for a new price there would certainly be. The final depreciation of silver must mean a rise in the price of commodities which that silver is to buy. Let the House remember the illustration of the hon. Member for Bolton (Mr. J. K. Cross) as regards the opium sales. Let me give another illustration. The Home charges include interest for the guaranteed railways to the amount of about £4,500,000. If silver settles down at a price showing a great depreciation, and a general rise in prices then it would be perfectly just to raise the tariffs of the railways in proportion to the increase in price of other commodities; and, by such a revision, the Government would gain in one way what they lost by the payment of the interest in gold. I give this merely as an illustration of the mode in which expenditure would have to be revised. But, however this may be, whatever financial measures it may be necessary to take with a view to establishing financial equilibrium, I deprecate measures which would tamper with the currency of India, which would tend still further to depreciate silver, and to close the avenues to its use, and that at a crisis when we should rather see how we could further open the door to silver in the East, where, from the remotest times it has always been required; and I deprecate also, in the strongest manner, measures which would leave the management of the exchanges in the hands of any Government. I am glad to congratulate Her Majesty's Ministers for having had the firmness to resist the proposals of the Indian Government on the subject of the currency—proposals which ought never to have been made.

MR. BALFOUR, as a Member of the Departmental Committee which has sat to consider the proposal of the Government of India with respect to the currency, wished to say a few words on that subject. It was clear, then, in the first place, that all the schemes which ha been proposed as remedies for the evils which had been referred to, and especially that of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe), were based on an artificial, instead of a natural currency in India. They attempted to establish a currency whose value should depend, not on natural causes, but on the action of the Government; and they ran counter, therefore, to the opinion of all the authorities on the question who were of the least weight. It was only on grounds of the utmost gravity that the principle of a natural currency should be departed from, and then only when it was conclusively shown that the remedy would completely cure the evil sought to be removed. Now, what was this evil? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London had said that it consisted in extracting from an impoverished population an extra £3,000,000—the £3,000,000, namely, which were required to make up the difference between the number of rupees required to pay the Home charges when the rupee was at 2s., and the number required when the rupee was at 1s. 7d. If it was true that the Indian taxpayer would, in the long run, have to pay this additional charge, no doubt, any scheme which, in the long run, promised to relieve him of it would deserve respectful consideration. But it was a mistake to suppose that any fall in the value of the rupee could have such an effect. The burden which taxation in any country threw on the taxpayer might be estimated—could, indeed, only be estimated—by the proportion of the produce of his toil which he had to hand over to the Government. The fact that more rupees were required (owing to the fall in silver) to pay the gold debt, did not in the least show that more of such produce was required to pay that debt, and did not consequently show that the Indian taxpayer would have to undergo more sacrifices in order to meet his liabilities. It was true that he would have to pay more rupees; but the very circumstances which produced this state of things would provide him with more rupees wherewith to pay. He maintained that as long as the products of India retained their existing ratio in relation to gold, it was impossible that the taxpayers of India could suffer by a depreciation in the value of the silver coinage. On the contrary, he maintained that the fall in the value of silver would lighten, instead of increasing, the burdens of the taxpayer of India, because India had a silver debt; and while the loss on the gold debt would in the long run be only nominal, the gain on the silver debt would be real and substantial. He would not, however, under-rate the great difficulties which the present state of things threw on the Government of India. Those difficulties were extremely grave, but they were only administrative difficulties. They embarrassed the Indian Government, because they compelled it to alter the incidence of taxation, and to re-distribute its taxes. Moreover, a great amount of uncertainty was thrown into all anticipations of Revenue, and it was impossible to frame a Budget that could be depended on. He was not surprised, therefore, that every Indian financier should grasp at any remedy for such a state of things. But every historical example of a currency artificially managed, and in the hands of a Government, showed that a currency of this kind was subject to fluctuations of an extremely violent character. If, then, the object of the Indian Government was to obtain certainty in their calculations, that object would not be attained by adopting a currency depending on the caprice of men rather than on natural causes. Considering, therefore, that the evils to be remedied were by no means of the serious kind sometimes imagined, and also that such evils as existed would probably not be remedied by any interference with the currency, he thought that Her Majesty's Government had done wisely in rejecting any scheme of the kind, whether it was that proposed by the Indian Government, or that proposed by the right hon. Member for the University of London. Turning now from the question of the exchanges to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), he observed that though this was full of gloomy anticipations, yet that the only part of it in which he understood the right hon. Gentleman to have attacked the financial policy of the Government was that which related to the cotton duties. He had listened to the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman on that point with extreme surprise. The right hon. Gentleman indignantly asked "What sort of country it was

[Third Night.]

which they had selected for their economic experiments?" and seemed to think that the poverty of India was a sufficient reason for leaving her without Free Trade. Then the right hon. Gentleman invited them to compare that with their conduct towards Canada, which, as he seemed to imply, we permitted to settle her own fiscal system, because we were afraid to meddle with her. Those were extraordinary remarks to come from a Free Trader like his right hon. Friend. They seemed entirely to misapprehend the nature of the Free Trade argument. When the right hon. Gentleman said India was so poor that we ought not to force her to adopt Free Trade, one might think that, in his opinion, Free Trade was a costly luxury. And when he said that we allowed our Colonies to adopt their own system and compelled India to adopt ours, one might imagine that Free Trade was an economic theory devised for the benefit of Great Britain, and which we propagated by force wherever we thought we might do so with impunity. Such arguments seemed to him to miss the whole point of the Free Trade doctrine. What was the essence of that doctrine, and why was it absolutely opposed to the imposition of differential duties? For this reason—that the result of such duties was that the unfortunate consumer had to pay a great deal more out of his own pocket than came into the Treasury from the tax on the article he bought, the difference going into the pocket of the manufacturer who was protected. But the poorer the country was the less it could afford so to subsidize the producer, and the more important was it to give it the boon of Free Trade. It was only a rich country that could afford to be Protectionist.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, he had a few observations which, with the permission of the House, he desired to make before the debate came to a conclusion, especially as during the two former nights of the discussion certain questions had been addressed to him, and several matters of a controversial character had been referred to in the course of the evening by his right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone). His right hon. Friend had indulged in very gloomy anticipations as to the future of India, and, among other things, had pointed to the case of the

Bombay riots. He felt it his duty to state that the latest information which the Government had received upon this subject was, he was happy to say, that these disturbances had in them nothing whatever of a political character; and the opinion of those best qualified to judge was that there was nothing very serious about them to which it was necessary to attach importance. His right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich seemed to think that India had within the last few years made a very much smaller improvement in its social condition than we had a right to expect, and, at the same time, he appeared to minimize the advance which had actually taken place. With regard to that, he could only say that trustworthy Civil servants who had spent the last 20 or 30 years in India, and had lately returned, were of opinion that there was nothing more remarkable than the changes which had taken place in the country during the last quarter of a century. There had, as they all knew, been an advance in education, and the material prosperity of the people, which although retarded, as it undoubtedly had been, by Famines, had in more recent times considerably advanced. His right hon. Friend seemed to think that since Her Majesty the Queen had been proclaimed Empress of India a very different condition of things had been brought about, and he suggested that not only the financial condition, but the financial legislation of India had gone to the better. With the permission of the House, he would touch upon two or three points to which reference had been made. In the first place, the right hon. Gentleman had condemned, in no measured terms, the War in Afghanistan. Well, the House and the country had decided the question; and by the brilliant success of the British arms we had obtained not only a strong Frontier on the North West of India, but, as the Government believed, the friendship of the Ruler of Afghanistan. His right hon. Friend had dwelt, also, upon the remission of the cotton duties, and appeared entirely to disapprove the action of the Government with reference to those duties; but he (Mr. E. Stanhope) had noticed that when a Motion upon this subject was brought forward by the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Briggs) neither he nor any other right hon. Gentleman were in their places, and the House only now had it in on the authority of the right hon. Gentleman that he resolutely opposed the policy of Her Majesty's Government. He had asked why they had thought it necessary to remit any portion of the import duties in preference to the export duties? The reason was simple; the House of Commons had declared by a unanimous Vote that the remission should be first made in the cotton duties. Another conclusive reason was, that if they had to deal with the export duty on rice they would have had to supply the loss by making a provision to the extent of nearly £500,000; but by extending the exemption to a certain portion of the cotton goods imported into India, it was found that they could give specific relief to that portion of the trade which was seriously hampered by protective duties on imports by sacrificing £150,000 a-year. Again, his right hon. Friend appeared to think that during the time in which Lord Lytton had been in India, grave events had happened which placed the financial system in India in a worse state. Now, as far as he was able to judge, there was very little to support any such contention, although his right hon. Friend had managed to drag in every conceivable topic—such as the legislation with respect to arms and the Vernacular Press, and other matters of prejudice against the Government of India. The fact was that Lord Lytton and the Government of India had had to deal with a most exceptional state of things, for instance, with the terrible loss by exchange. They had also been obliged to contend with Famines; but, in spite of all this, what had they achieved? They had advanced in a very material degree the policy of decentralization happily commenced by Lord Mayo, which everybody would admit to be of the greatest possible advantage to India; they had equalized the tax on salt which previous financiers had desired to accomplish; and they had introduced enormous reforms into the import and export tariff of the country. That was a catalogue of services which would one day be fully recognized, but which his right hon. Friend did not think it worth while to notice in the view which he had taken of the financial situation. But he (Mr. E. Stanhope) believed that neither the House nor the country would desire to listen to any recriminations, and that they would look at the substantial propositions now made by the Government, and consider them upon their merits. It had been a source of satisfaction that the policy of the Government had met with the general approval of the House of Commons. They would, no doubt, have very great difficulties with which to contend in carrying out a policy of reduction of Expenditure; but to that reduction that House as well as the Government were pledged; and when Lord Lytton entered upon that difficult task, he would have the gratification of feeling that he had the support not only of Her Majesty's Government at home but of the House of Commons, in the measures which he might introduce. At the same time, it was perfectly well known that everybody was ready to support economy in the abstract; but in matters of detail there was always a great difference of opinion. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to suggest that it was necessary to effect a reduction of annual expenditure to the extent of £4,000,000, and based this view of the case solely upon an opinion expressed by the hon. Member for the Elgin Burghs (Mr. Grant Duff) who, however, if he remembered rightly, had not put this forward as a thing which ought to be done, but as a thing which might possibly be done, because a considerable reduction was made some years ago. The policy which the Government had adopted was simply this—they would endeavour in every financial year to secure a bond fide surplus of £2,000,000 sterling, which, if it could be secured year by year, would, as the Government believed, place the finances of India upon a thoroughly sound basis. This was a proposition which had never been controverted, and, relying upon it, he asserted that the reduction indispensably necessary to secure the object in view was far less than that recommended by the right hon. Gentleman. Coming to the item of Public Works, the Government had been told that they were reducing the expenditure in a sort of panic; but nothing could be further from the real facts of the case. The policy of the Government was to lay down for their Public Works expenditure as definite a rule as possible; and they desired to fix the limit of Public Works expenditure at a sum which, in ordinary years, could be borrowed without any extraordinary disturbance of the money market. The hon. Member for Bolton (Mr. J. K. Cross), in his excellent speech, had objected to a reduction of expenditure unless there was a reduction of the Staff also. Undoubtedly, the latter would have to be reduced; that was an inevitable necessity. And, again, it was also unavoidable that a certain number of labourers in India should be thrown out of employment. They did not propose to make the whole reduction at once; but it would be made by the Government of India as opportunity offered. If the House should approve that policy, then in the Budget Statement of next year the whole amount to be taken for the capital expenditure on Public Works would be limited to £2,500,000. There was another point to which he must allude. It had been suggested that the danger of any such reduction as was now proposed was that there might be a disposition to stop necessary repairs; but, in his opinion, there could be no worse economy than such a proceeding. They must spend as much money as was necessary to keep the works which had been already constructed in proper repair; and as it was their desire to show a good balance-sheet, with regard to the works in question, they had the strongest motive for so doing. He next came to the Army, and would remind the House that the effect of the re-organization of the Army, effected by the Government of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone), was to throw increased charges on India. The Duke of Argyll, to his credit, protested against those increased charges being thrown on India, and, so far as he was concerned, did his best to prevent it; but he had no power in the matter, and the fact was, as had been pointed out on several occasions, that extra charges for the Army had been thrown upon India without the Indian authorities being consulted. The time, in his opinion, had arrived when some of those questions must be re-considered. As to the reduction of Army expenditure, the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) had asked him the other day whether he could give some further account of what it was proposed to do; but he was sorry to say that he was not able to give him any full details on the subject. The hon. Member, however, was aware that this question, as well as that of the re-organization of the Indian Army, was about to be dealt with by a Commission which would be appointed for that purpose. To that Commission important and definite instructions would be given; but with regard to its composition, he was unable at that moment to give any exact information. Some of the Members to be appointed were, however, known; and he need not say that a certain telegram, which had been forwarded from India, as to the composition of the Commission, was entirely without authority. But he trusted before long to give the House further information with regard to the subject, and to state fully what the construction of the Commission would be. Then the right hon. Gentleman said that he hoped the Government did not look for a small result. As he had stated on a previous occasion, they were led to believe by the Government of India that a very substantial result could be arrived at with regard to the Army expenditure, a result which, he trusted, would be fully realized at no distant date. Again, it was asked what was to be the effect of the changes which had taken place on the North-West Frontier of India upon the Army expenditure? Upon that subject he did not wish to give the House any statement of his own at the present time. Undoubtedly, expenses would be incurred; but, on the other hand that expenditure would, to a great extent, be compensated by the increased security to the North-West Frontier. He admitted at once, however, that some works would be necessary; for instance, the construction of railways on the Frontier of Afghanistan, some extension of which, at least in that direction, would be inevitable, and he felt sure the House would agree that if they could push on those very important works it would conduce very much to the security of our Frontier. With regard to the "cutting down" in the Civil Service, suggested by his right hon. Friend, the subject of reduction in this Department deserved grave consideration; but to use vague language about reduction appeared to him to be utterly useless, and calculated to inspire distrust amongst those who were likely to enter our service. If, however, the Government thought it just that a reduction should be made in the salaries or pensions, they would come down to the House with a specific proposition to that effect. Having indicated the other day their intended policy of employing a greater number of Natives than heretofore in the Civil Service of India, he was glad to assure the House that, in his opinion, when the actual proposal was seen, it would be found of great importance, and to offer to Natives a larger sphere of usefulness in the service of the country. Upon that subject Correspondence had been passing between the Secretary of State for India and the Indian Government, which would be laid upon the Table of the House; but, perhaps, he might be allowed to reserve his opinion whether they would be presented at the present stage, or their presentation deferred until the Correspondence was complete. His right hon. Friend had urged upon Her Majesty's Government to recommend that, as far as possible, Indian expenditure should be localized in India; and upon this point he might say that they had always instructed the Government of India to make as many contracts in India as possible; if these contracts could be made and paid for in silver, so much the better for them. The right hon. Gentleman had gone on to urge that some greater financial control, such as that which existed by the Treasury in England, was very desirable; but it would appear that, in so doing, he underrated the existing Financial Department in Calcutta, which subjected all schemes to the most rigid investigation, and in consequence of which it would probably not be far from the truth to say that it was as much disliked as the Treasury in this country. As for the scheme of financial control which the right hon. Gentleman had suggested, it was too grave a matter for him to express any opinion upon it off-hand; and he would, therefore, pass on to other points. First, there had been a great difference of opinion concerning the loss by exchange; and it was a fact that, while, on the one hand, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) had said that this fall in silver was not the main difficulty to be contended with, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe) thought that immediate steps should be taken to remedy it. The hon. Member for Bolton (Mr. J. K. Cross) had said that the Government exaggerated their loss by exchange, inasmuch as they took no accounts of the gain they experienced in consequence of the increased amount received for opium. He was scarcely prepared for the point raised by the hon. Member, but the fact, if it were true, ought to appear in the opium Returns; but he found that while they used to get £133, £138, and £139 per chest for their opium, since the silver difficulty they had been receiving for the years 1875-6, £125; for 1876-7, £128; for 1877-8, £132; and for the year 1878-9, which was an incomplete year, £143 per chest. With the last single exception, which would not, when the Returns were complete, prove to be one, the price of opium per chest was lower since the fall in silver than it was before. The reason for the gain upon opium was that the sales had increased from 45,000 to 55,000 chests a-year. Passing from that point, the hon. Member for Bolton had urged upon the Government that they ought to have given a good forecast of what was likely to happen with respect to the demand for silver.

Mr. Balfour

[Third Night.]

Mr. E. Stanhope

Mr. J. K. CROSS: I said a forecast as to the amount of silver you will have to sell in future.

Mr. E. STANHOPE said, he had certainly understood the hon. Member in a different sense; but with regard to a forecast of the future, such a feat was certainly beyond the limited powers which he possessed, and the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London showed how difficult it would be to attempt to make one. One event alone, the suspension of the sale of silver on the part of Germany, had entirely changed the aspect of affairs. It remained for him to thank the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London, with the greater part of whose speech he cordially agreed, especially for his sympathetic expressions with regard to the Indian Government in the present conditions of affairs; he had pointed out great difficulties, but had made the fullest allowance for them, and had, at the same time, attempted to remedy them. It was a gratification to know that in the anxious and important crisis of affairs in India, the decision of the Government to make no change in the currency was supported by the opinion of that House. It appeared to him that the increase of the Home charges was the greatest difficulty in their financial arrangements; and he could not help thinking that there was some inconsistency in that part of the speech of the hon. Member for Bolton where he urged upon the Government, first, the propriety of reducing their Home charges, and then the necessity of borrowing, not in India, but in England. He (Mr. E. Stanhope) quite admitted that, financially speaking, a great deal might be said on both sides of this question. It might be right to borrow in England, and it might be right to borrow in India, upon purely financial grounds; but he thought the political grounds were conclusively on the side of borrowing in India at the present period; and if they were to reduce the Home charges, they must, undoubtedly, endeavour to reduce their borrowing in England. Hon. Members had listened to a very interesting and exhaustive debate, extending over three nights; and he took the opportunity of reminding the House that the Government had already given up two nights for the purpose at an early period of the Session, for which reason, among others, he trusted that there might be no further delay before going into Committee.

Question put, and agreed to.

ACCOUNTS considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. FAWCETT said, that after the long debate which they had had that evening, he did not desire to offer any opposition to the passing of these formal Resolutions; but he did hope that before the Budget was agreed to the Under Secretary of State for India would give them more specific information than had yet been given. Throughout all the speeches which they had had that evening, and especially in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), which had produced so great an effect, the cardinal point which had been dwelt upon was the reduction of expenditure upon the Army. At present, however, they were without specific information as to what course the Government was going to take upon that point. It seemed to him that the utmost economy in Public Expenditure in India was desirable, and he took that opportunity of giving the Under Secretary of State fair warning that the greatest possible dissatisfaction would be felt, and that there would be the greatest and most serious reaction, if it was found that the only economy practised had been in Public Work and that nothing was done to reduce the Army expenditure. He, for one, he the opinion, which, he thought, was shared by everyone who had devoted any attention to Indian finance, that it was absolutely impossible to place the finances of India in a satisfactory condition unless the present expenditure of the Army was reduced by at least £3,000,000 a-year. And a reduction like that could not be expected unless some fundamental change were made. They ought, too, to be told by the Under Secretary of State for India that there was no truth in the telegram that had appeared in some of the journals purporting to come from India, to the effect that this Commission, upon the appointment of which they had been asked to report, was going to be a Commission consisting of three Commanders-in-Chief in India and one civilian. One of the first reflections that would occur to any one looking at India was that the very first step in the reduction of Military expenditure should be the abolition of the three separate commands in Calcutta, Madras, and Bombay. Were that done, it would be an illustration of the old adage, "a penny wise and a pound foolish." Yet it had been stated, in a telegram from a person in India, who was generally found to be in close communication with the Government, that it had been already suggested by the Viceroy that the Commanders-in-Chief in Madras and Bombay should report upon this Commission. It would be found that the recommendations of a Committee framed in that manner would extend to economy in everything save Army expenditure. There was another point connected with this of cardinal importance, and upon which that House had a right to expect some information—namely, as to whether the Commission which was going to be appointed would be charged to inquire into changes connected with Army organization, or only with the expenditure connected with the Army in India. He asked the Under Secretary of State to give them some information upon that point; for he felt that if there were to be a sufficient reduction and saving made in the Expenditure of India, it must be done by reducing the present excessive Army expenditure. For these reasons he pressed for some definite information upon the points he had named.

Mr. E. Stanhope

MR. E. STANHOPE said, that he would give all the information that he had it in his power to do at present. But it was not in his power to give any definite idea of what the Commission to be appointed would do except that it would deal generally with the organization and expenditure of the Army in India. The telegram to which the hon. Member for Hackney had alluded, that the Commission would consist of the three Commanders-in-Chief, was not true. The statement that the Home Government would limit the reduction in any way was also not true. The Commission would enter into all questions connected with the organization of the Army. There were, however, many questions affecting it which the Commission in India could not properly have brought before it, and they would be reserved for inquiry in this country. So far as he was aware, all questions affecting the organization of the Army in India, which would properly fall within their cognizance, would be brought before that Commission.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL observed, that it had been stated upon the evidence of two civilians, who had been 25 years in India, that a very great improvement had been effected in that country both in the administration and the material condition of the people. He considered that to say that the material condition of the people had been improved was begging the whole question. No doubt there had been very great changes effected in the face of the country in respect of railways and public works, and many other matters. As regarded the physical conditions, in many ways there had been very great improvement. But in respect to the material condition of the people, he must say that, having passed the greatest part of the last 35 years in India, he still considered it quite matter of doubt as to whether any improvement had taken place. They had seen it asserted that the people of India, so far from having been improved in their material condition, had been vastly impoverished. That statement he believed to be wholly exaggerated; but he thought there had not been anything like such a palpable and evident improvement in the material condition of the people as his hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for India would have them believe. It had been put to them by the hon. Gentleman that this improvement had been clear and undoubted; and he only said these few words by way of caution, and to express his opinion that there was really doubt whether any such improvement in the material condition of the people of India had taken place as was stated. This matter seemed to him to be one which should be carefully considered before they came to a hasty conclusion.

MR. ONSLOW would remind the Committee that, a few years ago, evidence was given by the Governors and Lieutenant Governors of India upon this question of the material condition of India. One and all of those officers stated it as their opinion that the material condition of the people of India had vastly improved under our administration. They also said that great changes had been made in the direction of material progress in India, and that ever since they had been in India the improvement had been going on. He merely wished, on this occasion, to urge upon the Under Secretary of State for India the vast importance of this Commission which was to be appointed. Was it to be a sham Commission or was it to be a real one? They had expected that there would be some material reduction in the expenditure upon the Army, and they desired to see appointed on that Commission gentlemen of the Army and civilians who would thoroughly go into the matter and sift the whole thing. There were political questions to be considered, and many other topics; and he would urge upon the Under Secretary, and upon the noble Lord the Secretary of State for India, the importance of appointing men upon the Council of the Commander-in-Chief of each Presidency who thoroughly understood the whole question. He was one of those who agreed with the hon. Gentleman the Member for Hackney in considering that only one Commander-in-Chief was required in India; and, therefore, he thought that this Commission should be composed of practical men who thoroughly understood the organization of the Indian Army. After what had taken place in that House it was to be expected that the whole matter would be thoroughly gone into. A great reduction was required, especially in the matter of the Army, and they ought to have an assurance that this Commission would not be a sham but a reality, and that men would be appointed upon it who thoroughly understood every phase of the administration of India. He would like to say, however, a few words with regard to what had been stated as to the plan to employ the Natives of India in the administration. That was a very important subject; and he hoped that before any plan was adopted it would be laid before that House, and they would be enabled to express an opinion upon it. It was a very serious thing to employ the Natives of India to a large extent in the administration, and, if done at all, it must be done in a very gradual manner. He therefore trusted that no step would be taken until the plan had been fully laid before that House.

MR. LAING wished to point out, with reference to the statement of the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India as to the expenditure upon the public works, that it had been laid down as a principle that some works were to be remunerative, and some were to be unproductive. He did not think that the Government had sufficiently realized the fact that they could never cut their Budget down so long as they spent money upon public works which were not authorized by the condition of the Indian Revenues. Within the last eight or ten years there had been an expenditure of upwards of £20,000,000 sterling upon works which had been, so far, utterly unproductive. By the last official Returns, the revenues received from these so-called remunerative works had only amounted to the sum of £2,000 per annum. That was the amount of the receipts upon an outlay of £20,000,000; in other words, that expenditure had been utterly unproductive, and the receipts had been only sufficient to pay for the working expenses. It was not sufficient merely to call works productive with the vague hope that they would produce some revenue, and such a hope did not warrant them in making such an expenditure. It was not sufficient to say that the finances of India were in so flourishing a condition that they could go on spending money so long as they could borrow it in India. There ought not to be a single penny spent upon these works unless they had the assurance that they were going to get a return for their money. But, for the last 10 years, they had been going spending money upon works which made no return whatever; and they must fairly face the fact that they had made an utterly unproductive expenditure, and that the money spent had been lost just as much as if it had been bestowed upon the ordinary Civil or Military expenditure of the country. With regard to the Commission, if he might venture to express an opinion upon it, it was that—that they should put it in the power of the Commission to limit the expenditure of the Government of India to a certain point. It was no use telling the Commission to find an item here or there which might be cut down. They should be instructed that the Expenditure of the country was to be reduced to a certain limit. What they wanted was to put their coat according to their cloth. It should be stated that they must reduce their Military expenditure below a certain figure in order to suit their finances, and the Commission should be instructed to prepare a scheme by which they might get the best Army in India for the money which they could afford to pay for it. He was sure that nothing could be done if the military authorities were merely directed to cut down an item here or there.

MR. C. BECKETT-DENISON would not detain the Committee many moments, but there were one or two subjects upon which he should like to take that opportunity of making a few observations. He would be in the recollection of the Committee that during the last few years and upon almost every occasion on which the Indian accounts had been discussed, very great stress had been laid upon the importance of reducing the expenditure upon the unproductive public works of India. He held in his hand a melancholy record showing an expenditure of £6,500,000 upon barracks in India. He believed that there was a sort of idea that a very large portion of that expenditure had been unnecessarily laid out. There were one or two instances which he would quote, which would illustrate very well the way in which money had been unnecessarily and wastefully spent. In the first place, there were some barracks at Allahabad which had cost £250 for each man accommodated. 150 miles due north of these barracks in the same Province, there were other barracks where the expenditure was £130 per man instead of £250. There must be some reason for this enormous disparity in the cost. There were other instances of the same sort of thing. There was a sanatorium built at a place in the Upper Himalayas for a regiment of troops which cost £130,000. The sum was large, but still it might be a proper expenditure; but they found that a road had been constructed to this sanatorium—a military road of 70 miles in length—of which the cost had been £237,000, or £3,000 a-mile. He asked whether that was an expenditure which was really wise under the present circumstances of India. He thought that the reason for it was that someone in a position of authority had been enabled to enforce his ideas in the Military Council of India, and, as a consequence, money had thus been recklessly spent. In his opinion, it was this enormous source of expenditure, going on from year to year utterly unchecked, which brought India into these financial difficulties which they all so much deplored. He did not believe, either with regard to the remunerative public works of India, or the unremunerative public works, that there was any reason whatever why they should not assume that there was a very large ground for economy. He was afraid that the Commission, of which they had heard that evening, would be one to inquire into the Military expenditure, and would not inquire into the expenditure upon military buildings. It was to be feared that the expenditure on these matters would be outside the reference made to the Commission; and, if so, he saw no reason why the expenditure should go on unchecked in the future as it had in the past. There was, in the present year, a new Estimate for £500,000 on account of Public Works. No doubt it was a small sum compared to other amounts that had been spent; but it was considerable in its way. He did hope that the Commission which was to sit in India would not be deprived of the opportunity of inquiring into every branch of the Military expenditure. It had been stated before in that House that there were but two Departments in India in which it was absolutely necessary to practise economy, and those were the Public Works and the Army in all its branches. He would remind the Committee that the expenditure upon the non-effective Army Services in India were, at the present time, £2,000,000 a year. That was a scale of charge for non-effective Services which was utterly without parallel in any Army in Europe. The reason for that expenditure was in the changes that took place when India passed under the Imperial Government, and enormous claims were made for compensation by officers who retired, or were seconded, or what not. The late Lord Sandhurst pointed out that the non-effective charges for the Army in India, which in his days scarcely came up to £1,000,000, would in a few years be doubled, and his words had been verified by the result. He hoped that this point, also, would not be lost sight of by the Commission, and that the attention of the House would be seriously given to every branch of the useless and unjustifiable expenditure now going on in India.

MR. MARK STEWART said, that he had heard his hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for India state the very large amount of Revenue which was derived from the opium traffic in India. In calling the attention of the Committee to this branch of the Revenue, he did so because he considered it one of the most important sources of revenue in India, and if it failed, they would be in a far worse position than they were now. But there were undoubted signs that that revenue, which was always so fluctuating and precarious, might undergo very serious diminution. China was now growing large quantities of opium in opposition to the importation from India, and a very hostile spirit had been evinced both by the Chinese Government and people against the import of Indian opium. Therefore, either by the increased cultivation of opium in China, or by the entire prohibition of the import of Indian opium into China—in both those two ways the revenue might be seriously diminished. Considering that this was the second largest source of revenue they had in India, it was but right that the country should know all the facts in discussing this question. Yet, he had observed that in almost every speech made upon this subject, there had either been no notice taken of this precarious revenue, or it had been treated slightly as of no great moment. Having made these few observations, he would not trouble the Committee at any further length upon the subject at that time.

Resolved, That it appears by the Accounts laid before this House that the Ordinary Revenue of India for the year ending the 31st day of March 1878 was £51,795,866; the Revenue from Productive Public Works, including the Net Traffic Receipts from Guaranteed Companies, was £7,173,435, making the total Revenue of India for that year £58,969,301; that the Ordinary Expenditure in India and in England, including Charges for the Collection of the Revenue, for Ordinary Public Works, and for Interest on Debt exclusive of that for Productive Public Works, was £55,147,832; the Expenditure on Productive Public Works (Working Expenses and Interest), including the payments to Guaranteed Companies for Interest and Surplus Profits, was £7,364,556, making a total Charge for that year of £62,512,388; that there was an excess of Expenditure over Income in that year amounting to £3,543,087; and that the Capital Expenditure on Productive Public Works in the same year was £4,791,052.

House resumed.

Resolution to be reported upon Monday next.

EAST INDIA LOAN (£5,000,000) BILL.
(Mr. Raikes, Mr. Edward Stanhope, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

[BILL 197.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Edward Stanhope.)

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL hoped that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer would allow the debate upon this Bill to be adjourned. He begged to move that the debate be now adjourned.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Sir George Campbell.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER trusted that the House would now pass the second reading of this Bill. There were various questions raised, no doubt, by the Amendments put down; but there would be plenty of opportunities when a full discussion could take place. He would remind the House of the late period of the Session at which they had now arrived, and how absolutely necessary it was to press on Bills.

SIR DAVID WEDDERBURN said, he was willing to adjourn the consideration of the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

MR. ONSLOW thought they had had a very fair discussion on Indian finances—a discussion which had lasted over three nights. The Motion of his hon.

Friend the Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) went into the subject of Indian Revenue in considerable detail, and he hoped that he would now allow the Government to proceed with this stage of the Bill.

MR. FAWCETT remarked, that the £5,000,000 Bill had, to a certain extent, been the subject of discussion during the three nights' debate that they had had upon the Indian Budget. There might be one or two important questions raised affecting English and Indian finances in relation to the £2,000,000 Bill, and he wished to raise a distinct issue upon that. Very great demands were made at that period of the Session upon the time of private Members, and he thought that it would be fair for the Government not to press the second reading of the £2,000,000 Bill at that time.

MR. E. STANHOPE would not take the second reading of the £2,000,000 Bill then; but he hoped that the second reading of the Bill now under consideration would be passed.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he would withdraw his Amendment, on the understanding that an opportunity for discussing the Bill was allowed at the next stage.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

COMMON LAW PROCEDURE AND JUDICATURE ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.
(Mr. Waddy, Mr. Wheelhouse, Mr. Ridley.)

[BILL 181.] COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. CALLAN objected to the Bill being taken at that late hour. There were serious objections to the Bill which would need full discussion, and he begged to notice that 40 Members were not present.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members not being present,

Mr. Speaker resumed the Chair:—House counted, and 40 Members not being present,

House adjourned at a quarter after One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 13th June, 1879.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—

Inclosure Provisional Order (Matterdale Common) * (107); Inclosure Provisional Order (East Stainmore Common) * (108); Inclosure Provisional Order (Redmoor and Golberdon Commons) * (109); Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (Killarney, &c.) * (110); Local Government (Highways) Provisional Orders (Dorset, &c.) * (111); Local Government (Highways) Provisional Orders (Gloucester and Hereford) * (112); Local Government Provisional Orders (Aspull, &c.) * (113); Local Government Provisional Orders (Castleton by Rochdale, &c.) * (114); Metropolitan (Whitechapel and Limehouse) Improvement Scheme Amendment * (115).

Second Reading—Costs Taxation (House of Commons) * (99).

Committee — Report — Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (Waterford, &c.) * (91); Public Health (Scotland) Provisional Order (Bothwell) * (92); West India Loans * (85).

Their Lordships met;—and having gone through the Business on the Paper, without debate—

House adjourned at half past Five o'clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 13th June, 1879.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—Report—Lighting by Electricity [No. 224].

PRIVATE BILLS (by Order)—Select Committee—Special Report — East Indian Railway [No. 226].

Third Reading—Lancaster Gas *, and passed.

PUBLIC BILLS — Ordered — First Reading — Inclosure Provisional Order (Whittington Common) * [207].

Select Committee—Report—Local Government Provisional Order (Cartworth) *.

Committee—Report—Customs and Inland Revenue [150].

QUESTIONS.

NAVY—THE LATE MR. W. FROUDE.
QUESTION.

MR. E. J. REED (for Mr. B. SAMUELSON) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether a suitable acknowledgment will be made to the family of the late Mr. W. Froude, F.R.S., of his great and gratuitous services to the Navy in investigating and determining the proper form of ships and propellers; and, whether arrangements will be made for carrying on the laboratory in which Mr. Froude conducted his investigations?

MR. W. H. SMITH, in reply, said, he had written to the hon. Gentleman who had given Notice of the Question asking him to postpone it. He could only say, at the present moment, that he cordially reciprocated the expression of acknowledgment due to Mr. Froude for the great and eminent services he had rendered.

GENERAL NATIONAL FUND FOR RELIEF OF FAMILIES OF SOLDIERS, SAILORS, &c.—QUESTION.

GENERAL SHUTE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will consider the desirability of a permanent general national fund being established for the relief of widows and orphans of soldiers, sailors, and marines who die in consequence of wounds and injuries received in the Services, and for increasing, under certain circumstances, the pensions awarded to men on discharge; and, whether the Government would recommend Her Majesty to issue a fresh Commission to the Commissioners' Patriotic Fund for the purpose of administering to a fund, such as above proposed, to take the place of those special funds to meet cases calling for unusual sympathy?

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, in answer to the first part of the Question, I have to say that I have frequently considered whether it would be possible to establish a general national fund for the purpose named by the hon. and gallant Member; but I have never seen my way to take any practical steps in that direction without the fear of interfering prejudicially with charitable institutions which are doing their work well. With regard to the second part of the Question, steps are being taken for the extension of the powers of the Commissioners' Patriotic Fund; but I am not able at this moment to say when the supplementary charter will be granted. It would, in any case, not be advisable to extend indefinitely such a supplemental charter. It might be extended beyond its present purposes; but it would not be wise to extend it indefinitely for all times.

ARMY REGULATION ACT—CASHIERED PURCHASE OFFICERS.—QUESTION.

GENERAL SHUTE asked the Secretary of State for War, If, in the event of a purchase officer being cashiered or dismissed from the service by sentence of court martial, Her Majesty has the power to direct that he be paid by the Army Purchase Commissioners the same amount to which he would be entitled on retirement of his own free will?

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, to be strictly accurate, the award of the Army Purchase Commissioners would be made under the Act of 1871, and not under the direction of Her Majesty. If a purchase officer is dismissed the Service, or cashiered under sentence of court martial, the court has power to order that he shall forfeit all pecuniary interest in the value of his commission; but if, by the grace of Her Majesty, he is gazetted out of the Army, he may be permitted to receive the value of his commission if the Commissioners award him such value. In the only case which has occurred they have done so. I may add that this applies to the regulation value only, but as to over-regulation value, I am informed that no case has arisen; but it would be for the decision of the Commissioners, and they would probably take into consideration the terms of The Gazette.

FISHERY LAWS—VIOLATION BY STEAM TRAWLERS.

QUESTION.

SIR DAVID WEDDERBURN asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether his attention has been directed to alleged infractions of the Fishery Laws on the part of steam trawlers off the eastern coasts of Scotland and the north of England, and to the want of efficient means for enforcing the law in those waters; and, whether he is prepared to take any measures for the better enforcing of the Fishery Laws by despatching a gunboat to the north eastern coast or otherwise?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Sir, my attention has been called within the last few days to alleged infractions of the Fishery Laws by steam trawlers, and I have called for a report from the captain of the Coastguard ship at Hull on the subject. It is open to the owners of any boats whose nets are injured, in breach of the Fishery Laws, themselves to prosecute the parties in fault. A gunboat will be despatched to watch the proceedings of these trawlers if it is necessary to do so; but it is doubtful whether the Admiralty have any legal power to interfere.

MINES (COAL) REGULATION ACT, 1872—INSPECTION OF COAL MINES.

QUESTION.

MR. BURT asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is his intention to amend his instructions to the Inspectors of Coal Mines which as at present frame allow a certificated manager to have several mines under his charge, and authorise indefinite periods of absence from the mine on the part of such manager, while the Act itself, in section 26, requires "every mine to be under the control and daily supervision of a manager?"

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, this is a very important point to which my hon. Friend has called the attention of the House; but what I wish to impress upon him, in the first place, is this—that I have made no change in the instructions that have existed from the time of the passing of the Act of 1872. The principle of the instructions to which my hon. Friend refers is not new at all, but is copied verbatim from the instructions that were drawn up in 1872. I, of course, am not responsible for them; but I presume the Secretary of State drew them up for the purpose of insuring that the provisions of the Act should be carried out in the most practical way. The conditions necessarily vary, and the arrangements may vary also according to the size and other circumstances of the mine, but must in each case be such as to secure the real effectual supervision of the every-day working of the mine. If they fail to do so, the Secretary of State would feel it his duty at once to take steps to interfere. As a doubt has been raised, I shall cause the Question of the hon. Member and my answer to be sent to the Inspectors, in order to show that it is not the intention of the Secretary of State to interfere with the actual carrying out of the Act of Parliament in its full meaning.

Colonel Stanley

ISLAND OF CYPRUS—PUNISHMENT OF PRIESTS.—QUESTION.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Government have any authentic information with regard to the alleged infliction of a degrading punishment on two Greek priests in Cyprus by the orders of the English authorities in the island; and, whether, if such a punishment were inflicted, it has received the subsequent sanction of the Foreign Office?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, in answer to the Question of the hon. Member, I have to say that, according to the information at the Foreign Office, two priests were sentenced in due course of law by the local Court at Famagosta—one of them to seven days, and the other to one month's imprisonment. We have asked for a Report upon the subject, and that Report is, I believe, now on its way home. With regard to the second part of the Question, I do not think it is likely that the Foreign Office, unless they find that some irregularity has taken place, will interfere either to sanction or disapprove of the sentence that has been carried out in pursuance of the judgment of a Court of Law.

PRISONS (IRELAND)—RELIGIOUS DENOMINATIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he will give a Return of the average numbers of the different religious denominations in the several gaols of Ireland, with the salaries of the chaplains?

MR. J. LOWTHER: I believe, Sir, the Returns to which the hon. Gentleman refers will be found included in those promised the other day on the Motion of the hon. Member for Longford County (Mr. Errington).

ILLEGAL LOTTERIES.—QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, If his attention has been called to an illegal lottery that has been extensively advertised to take place in Dublin, on the 26th June, under the superintendence of the High Sheriff and other magistrates; if he is aware that the Law against lotteries makes no exception in favour of lotteries for good objects, those for the City of Glasgow Bank and the West of England Bank charities; having been at once suppressed by the authorities; and, if Irish magistrates are to be allowed to set this law at defiance, or if he will take steps to have this illegal lottery also suppressed?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. GIBSON): Sir, my attention has been called by the Question to the bazaar and drawing of prizes advertised to be held in Dublin on the 26th instant. I am aware that the law against the advertising and publishing of lotteries does not purport to make any exceptions. I need hardly say that Irish High Sheriffs and magistrates enjoy no special immunities, and are in the same position as Scotch and English Sheriffs and magistrates. I think it is very probable that some of the gentlemen whose names appear in this advertisement did not read it attentively; and, indeed, I should not be surprised if some had not read it at all. The Crown and Treasury Solicitors in Ireland will, however, inquire into the circumstances of the advertisement referred to. I may add that I think lotteries for large sums of money, or for articles convertible into large sums of money, are open to much objection, and I hope that the public attention which has been called to this matter will be productive of good results.

SOUTH AFRICA — THE ZULU WAR — OVERTURES OF PEACE.—QUESTION.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the Government have laid before Parliament all the information which has been received concerning the overtures for peace which have been made by Cetewayo?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Sir, in reply to a previous Question from the hon. Baronet, I think on Monday last, I informed the House of all I knew as to the nature of the latest overtures made by Cetywayo and the terms of the reply sent by Lord Chelmsford. In a despatch received from Sir Bartle Frere within the last few days, I believe there are some inclosures relating to earlier overtures, which will be presented to the House on the first opportunity.

ARMY—THE FIRST CLASS ARMY RESERVE—VOLUNTEERS.—QUESTION.

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, in the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, men of the First Class Army Reserve, who may volunteer to rejoin the Colours, can be accepted; and, if so, whether any steps have been or are about to be taken to make this fact generally known; and, if, on the other hand, it is not competent for such volunteers to rejoin under the provisions of "The Enlistment Act, 1870," he proposes to introduce a short Bill amending that Act.

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, at an earlier period of the Session, when the hon. and gallant Member for Sunderland (Sir Henry Havelock) asked a similar Question, I was obliged to answer that, as I was then advised, many of the First Class Army Reserve men could not volunteer to join the Colours except for a period of six months. The question was referred to the Law Officers of the Crown, and they had a further consultation with the Lord Chancellor, and, I believe, with other legal authorities; and it is now held that the section of the Act which was supposed to be doubtful does admit of those men volunteering to join the Colours. It is, therefore, proposed to take advantage of this interpretation to a limited extent. It is proposed to make this known by an Army Circular, which I hope will be issued in the course of a few days; and I may add, the number of men to which it is proposed to limit the volunteering will be such as still to keep the numbers within the total provided for by Parliament at the commencement of the year, so that it will not be necessary to ask for any Supplementary Vote.

COAL MINES—THE DINAS COLLIERY EXPLOSION.—QUESTION.

MR. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If it has been reported to him by the legal gentleman appointed to watch the coroner's inquest in respect to the loss of over 60 lives by an explosion of fire damp in the Dinas Colliery, South Wales, that the jury had found that though the manager had been deprived of his certificate for gross negligence and incompetency, after a thorough judicial investigation, he had still been continued as manager by the owner or agent, or both; and, if he intends to take any steps to punish the party or parties that committed an act which set at defiance the decision of a regularly constituted court?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, the Coroner's jury had only just given their verdict in the case of this explosion, and he had not yet received the Report of the legal gentleman who attended the inquest on behalf of the Secretary of State. The course that it was proposed to take was this. If, on the Report of that gentleman, it appeared that legal proceedings ought to be taken against any person connected with the mine, he would at once proceed to take them. But there was one important point connected with the case, and that was that the explosion happened so long since, and the Coroner's jury had been so long in finishing the inquiry and giving their verdict, that the time limited by the statute, within which proceedings under the Act could be taken, had expired. In order to prevent such an occurrence in future, and to guard against those cases where, no death resulting, there was no Coroner's inquest, he proposed to introduce a short Bill to allow the Secretary of State to order a special inquiry in the case of mining accidents, in the same manner as he was empowered under the Act of 1875 to order special inquiries in case of accidents from explosive substances—a power which had been of so much benefit.

CRIMINAL LAW—CASE OF RYAN.
QUESTION.

MR. SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If it is the fact that a man named Ryan, who at the last Commission in Dublin was sentenced to nine months' imprisonment for causing the death of his wife, has recently been released by order of the Government, although an alleged accomplice of his is to be tried on that charge at the approaching Commission; and, if he can state the grounds on which Ryan has been released?

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach

MR. J. LOWTHER: Yes, Sir, it is the case that a man named Ryan, convicted of manslaughter, was sentenced to nine months' imprisonment in Dublin; but after reference to the Judge before whom the case was tried, he was released by order of the Government, on the ground of ill-health. As to the case of Collins, I understand it was one in which the man was charged with an offence of the same character; but, as a matter of fact, not with being an accomplice with the other; prisoner, and he applied to have his trial postponed. That application was acceded to, and the trial, I believe, stands for the next Sessions.

PARLIAMENT — ARRANGEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.—QUESTION.

MR. W. E. FORSTER asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, When the Education Estimates will be taken?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER stated that the Government proposed on Monday to take Supply—the Army Estimates; that, as he had said before, in consequence of the peculiar position of the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill, they proposed to devote the other days of the week at their disposal to that measure; and that, therefore, they would not be able next week to take the Education Estimates, as to which, however, due Notice would be given.

MR. CALLAN asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, for the convenience of Irish Members, When the Irish Estimates and the Scotch University Estimates will be taken?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Not next week. I cannot say exactly when; but due Notice will be given.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

METROPOLIS—LOCAL TAXATION.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE, in rising to call the attention of the House to the great increase of the Local Taxation of the Metropolis, while the Vestries failed to carry out any sufficient sanitary arrangements; and to move for a Select Committee to inquire into the powers of the Vestries and their administration of the funds at their disposal, said, that some of our most eminent statesmen had called attention to the government of the Metropolis. The noble Lord the present Prime Minister had made many eloquent speeches on the subject of the sanitary condition of the Metropolis; and the right hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) had said, in 1858, that he anticipated the time when the principle of self-government would be applied in its fullest extent to the Metropolis. The question had, too, engaged the attention of Royal Commissions and Select Committees, and Bills had been introduced on the subject. As a matter for legislation it had engaged the attention of such men as Sir George Grey, Sir Cornewall Lewis, and Mr. Buxton. The last to direct attention to it with a view to legislation was the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho), who urged the claims it had on the consideration of Her Majesty's Government. The necessity for a reform in the government of the Metropolis was increasing every year. The Registrar General informed the country that the population of the Metropolis was increasing at the rate of 75,000 per annum, and that, during the last seven years, 150,000 additional houses had been built within its boundaries. As Mr. Horton, in his valuable pamphlet, pointed out, the Metropolis was divided into 37 districts for the purpose of registration of births; into 56 districts for the duties of the Building Act; into 19 divisions for police purposes; into 13 County Court districts; into 15 Militia districts; and additional divisions for Inland Revenue, postal, and gas and water and Parliamentary purposes; so that a map of London must have 14 or 15 different boundaries to represent in each area the controlling powers. With this mere unorganized accretion of corporations, boards, vestries, commissioners, magistrates, and so forth, the administration of this Metropolis might very fitly be described in the words with which John Bunyan depicted the Valley of the Shadow of Death. It was, he said, "Every whit dreadful, being utterly without order." Comparing the ment of the parish of Marylebone with that of Westminster, it would be found that the population of each was about the same. Marylebone parish collected £194,036; Westminster City, £194,031. Marylebone parish was managed by one vestry, and its administrative expenses were under £8,000 per annum; while the five boards of local management in Westminster cost nearly £20,000. These five boards employed 21 clerks and vestry clerks, six surveyors, four solicitors, nine officers of health, six inspectors of nuisances—all these officers being employed for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the Metropolis Local Management Act. The gas and water supplies of the Metropolis were under the control of different Companies, who were hostile to each other. The result was that the water supply cost, according to the Registrar General, £1,283,000 a-year; whereas he asserted that it could be provided for £470,000 a-year. Moreover, each public gas lamp in London cost £4 10s. a-year, whilst in Manchester the cost was only £1 5s. Mr. Frith said the Gas Companies pretended that they had a right to a dividend of £10 per cent, and that in any scheme for purchase they must be paid at that rate, and that Londoners were precluded by legislation from supplying themselves. Now, the Gas Companies had funds which they called capital, which had never been investigated. And it seemed it was not capital at all; but on this the consumer was charged 10 per cent, and was even now paying 10 per cent, on the former ruinous competition. It was distinctly asserted that the Companies made £400,000 net profit on every £1,000,000 capital which Parliament permitted them to raise. The management of the Metropolitan Board of Works, he admitted, was admirable, and everything had improved since it was established in 1853, when there were 10,500 officials in London and over 150 vestries raising rates; but that was no reason why householders and ratepayers should be subjected to unnecessarily heavy burdens. He did not say that there was speculation; but, under the existing system, the ratepayers paid in some instances at least a third more than they ought to be called upon to do. It had been shown that the delay in traffic occasioned by the accumulation of snow, mud, and dirt in our streets involved a loss of at least £500,000. The condition of the fire brigade also demanded investigation. Whilst in Paris, with a population of 2,000,000, and in New York, with a population of 1,300,000, there were respectively 1,500 and 2,350 firemen, London, with her 4,000,000 of population, had only 406 firemen. There was a complete want of proper market accommodation owing to the absurd restrictions which prevented markets being established within, he believed, seven miles of the City. These and other evils he attributed to the system of vestries. The vestries fought amongst each other on questions as to the varying merits of wood pavement and macadam. In consequence of the vestry system, with all its anomalies, the state of the sewers and of the pavements in many districts was most unsatisfactory. He believed that one of the greatest evils of the present system was connected with the auditing of the vestry accounts. Some parishes were undoubtedly well managed in this respect; but he was credibly informed, for the information was based on a published document, that in some cases the auditors could neither read nor write. [A laugh.] That seemed an incredible assertion; but he made it on an authority that was open to any Member of the House, and if it was inaccurate he was not responsible. That document stated that no auditor could be relied upon carefully to examine parish accounts unless he could read and write, and that there were instances of the appointment of auditors who possessed neither qualification. The vestries made rates on the parishes, and declined to make satisfactory reports showing how the money they raised was expended. The vestries, however, were not slow in demanding that the action of other bodies should be inquired into. It was charming to find that they were fully alive to the faults of others, and anxious to see them corrected, although they must not be touched themselves. He held in his hand a printed paper headed "Relief of Ratepayers' Burdens," and it purported to be a "Statement in favour of inquiry into the administration of funds in possession of the City Guilds."

Mr. Baillie Cochrane

It went on to say that—

"The vestries of London were recently invited, in pursuance of a resolution adopted by the St. James's Vestry, to join in a Memorial to the Government, urging the necessity for inquiry into the condition and management of the property and charities of the several Metropolitan parishes and City Guilds."

The resolution above referred to ran thus:—

"That the several parishes in the Metropolis, the Corporation of the City of London, the Livery Companies of London, and other public bodies, now possess large funds available for educational purposes, for the relief of the poor, and for other public objects; and that, in view of the constantly-increasing burdens imposed on the ratepayers of the Metropolis by the Metropolitan Board of Works, the vestries, and the London School Board, in the carrying out of their varied and increasing powers, it is desirable for a full inquiry to be made, under the authority of a Royal Commission, into the character and circumstances of any such funds, in order to ascertain how far they may be rightfully directed to the relief of such ratepayers, and to all or any of the objects served by the several governing bodies and rating authorities of the Metropolis."

Now, the property of the City Guilds had been bequeathed for particular purposes; and although its value had, no doubt, greatly increased, it was doubtful whether that fact alone would justify an interference with the destination of that property. However that might be, the case of the vestries was very different. There the money spent was taken directly from the ratepayers; its amount was constantly increasing; and there could be no question of the right of the public to know and inquire into the manner in which it was disbursed. He now came to the charges which were made against the vestries. He would quote to the House some extracts taken from a printed paper issued by the Paddington Ratepayers' Association. If the statements there contained were incorrect, he was not responsible for them. This document said—

"There is a growing suspicion that the manner in which assessments are made, and rates expended, in some quarters calls for special investigation, and we believe that nothing short of such a step will give satisfaction to the public."

It continued—

"People will want to get at the particulars lying behind the gross amounts which are tabulated, and act, occasionally at least, as their own auditors; and if Parliamentary assistance be not afforded them for that purpose, it may be incumbent on them in their several parishes to appoint a local commission from their number to scrutinize vouchers, so that what is going on behind the scenes may be proclaimed on the housetops."

The paper went on to remark that, while pauperism and crime in the Metropolis were rapidly on the decline, there was no corresponding diminution in the burden of the rates; and that the inquiries made by independent residents of Paddington had revealed wasteful expenditure under various heads. It then added—

"The most entertaining and instructive portion is that which comes under the general rate account, and relates to 'refreshments.' The following particulars belong to one of many bills of the same description:—September 25. —Finance and Assessment Committees:—18 luncheons, £3 3s.; 17 dinners, £7 13s.; ale and stout, 7s.; sherry, £1 4s.; port, 18s.; hock, £4 10s.; cigars, 12s.; and dessert, 25s."

These were among the items of one dinner for the gentlemen who were spending the money of the ratepayers; and other refreshment bills were much of the same character. He asked whether those things were creditable to the local government of a great capital. Mr. Frith, in his admirable work on Municipal London, said that the government of the Metropolis was utterly without system, regularity, or order; that the ratings all differed, that there was no uniformity, and that in all things there was confusion and complication. Certain facts were very significant. In the last 19 years the vestries and district boards had not expended 18d. a-head in sanitary measures. The City had eight inspectors of nuisances, and St. Pancras had only one. The inspector for Chelsea reported that one-third of the houses infringed the sanitary regulations, and yet nothing was done to remedy the abuse. The cost of making roads in Mile End was £364 a-mile, while in Marylebone it was £1,200 a-mile. Again, the cost of watering streets was in Greenwich £50 a-mile; in Limehouse, £50; in Hackney, £15; in Mile End, £15; and in Whitechapel, £11. The cartage of dust and mud cost in St. Martin's, £70 a-mile; in Paddington, £67; in Greenwich, £65; in Limehouse, £23; and in Mile End, £19. On several previous occasions Bills relating to the government of the Metropolis had been introduced in that House; but they had not been passed. One measure was introduced by his noble Friend the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho), who had done so much to bring this matter under the notice of the public; but he did not see how it was possible for any private Member to carry a Bill for the better management of the Metropolis. The City of London was, in many respects, most admirably managed, and his noble Friend proposed to extend the area of the City. That, of course, was a plan open to many objections. Then there was the idea of making the Parliamentary boroughs separate Municipalities with a supreme Council. Earl Grey, who always took great interest in this question, proposed, not a Royal or Parliamentary Commission, but a Committee of Her Majesty's Privy Council, partly of Ministers of the Crown, partly of the late Ministers. A Report by such a Committee would be invaluable. It would be brought under the attention of Parliament much more clearly, and would be more likely to command attention. This, his Lordship stated, was the course followed with the Bill in 1850 for extending representative government to the Australian Colonies. To-day he only asked the Home Secretary to appoint a Board of Auditors for the investigation of the accounts of all these vestries. If it should be shown by the inequality of charges in the accounts that the Metropolis was not well governed, then it would be the duty of Her Majesty's Government to introduce a measure for the better government of London. The hon. Member concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the powers of the Vestries of the Metropolis, and their administration of the funds at their disposal,"—(Mr. Baillie Cochrane,) —instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Mr. THOMSON HANKEY had understood the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Wight to say that all he asked the Home Secretary to do was to appoint a certain number of Auditors to examine the accounts of these vestries. This, however, was not the object aimed at by the hon. Gentleman's Motion. The hon. Gentleman condemned the general management of the Metropolis, yet he seemed content to accept only a modified means of remedy. He went further than the language of his hon. Friend, being of opinion that the general management of the Metropolis was simply abominable. It was a disgrace to such a large town as this that there should be so little uniformity and so little good management in the general arrangements. Still, he believed the vestries did their duty extremely well for certain purposes. What was required was a Central Body to be placed over them all. The Board of Works had not supplied the requirement, although he admitted that that body fulfilled its functions admirably in many respects. The town of Paris was managed quite differently from London. There were eight or 10 different departments; but they were all centralized in one department, called the Department of the Seine. As to the subject of fires they were strictly part of police duties. What were the duties of the police, if they were not for the protection of life and property? The police could render essential service in a fire long before the brigade arrived. It was a discreditable thing in the management of London that the fire brigade should be under the Metropolitan Board of Works. He did not say the Board did not do its best, but it had not the power. There was divided authority, and this was the case also with regard to the cleansing of the streets.

LORD ELCHO said, he thought his hon. Friend had done good service in calling attention to this important question—the proper government, or, rather, the mis-government, of the Metropolis. The mis-government was so patent that it was not necessary to dwell on the subject. They had got the vestries, but there was no control over them. His hon. Friend had pointed to the City of London. They had controlling power there, and things were better managed. On one occasion, when he complained to the Metropolitan Board of Works about a part of London where a terrible stench prevailed, owing to the streets not being watered, as was believed, he was told that the Board had no power. This seemed to point to one of three things—that his hon. and gallant Friend the Chairman of the Board (Sir James M'Garel-Hogg) ought to have more power given him; that he ought to be merged in some other power; or that he ought to be abolished altogether. Clearly he ought not to be left in his present state of impotence. He (Lord Elcho) did not think the Committee proposed by his hon. Friend (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) would be very useful; but the hon. Gentleman had made a very good practical suggestion—namely, that the Government should appoint Auditors to look after the accounts of the vestries. He would suggest that the Motion should be withdrawn, and that the Government should consent to the appointment of Auditors. They heard of the bottles of hock, champagne, and other wines consumed by the vestrymen. That alone required an audit, and the practical solution would be for the Government to appoint an audit of the different district accounts. It might be that the stories one heard were not true; it might be that there was no jobbery; and, in that case, it would be better for the vestries that Auditors should be appointed. If it turned out, however, that there had been waste, they would have good ground for legislation.

Mr. Baillie Cochrane

MR. SCLATER-BOTH said, the subject raised by his hon. Friend was a very important one, and one in which they were all interested; but he hardly thought the House would be prepared to appoint a Select Committee, such as was asked for, neither did he think the suggestion for the appointment of Auditors would command general assent. It was admitted that the Metropolis Management Act had effected a change for the better. A great deal had been said about the shortcomings of the vestries; but what were the district boards but a combination of parish vestries? Under the Act to which he referred, no less than 46 parishes were combined in 12 district boards, and a substantial change for the better was, no doubt, the result. He was not prepared to defend the vestries from all the charges made against them. Their powers were, to a certain extent, limited. In some respects they exercised their power very well, and in other respects the shortcomings of the vestries were considerable. As to gas and water, those were matters of so serious a nature that they had not been left to the vestries, but had been taken in hand by Parliament. Measures had been passed providing for the water supply and lighting of the Metropolis. A great deal might be said as to whether the provisions of those Acts were adequate or not. It would be monstrous to enter into the question of the water supply in connection with the present Motion. The question raised by the present Motion was one of very great importance; but he should regard the extension of the City jurisdiction or the establishment of a new Centralized Body for control of the affairs of the Metropolis with some suspicion, and to establish such a body might prove to be a step in the wrong direction. He had taken some trouble to ascertain what had been the increased cost of the Metropolitan taxation, and he found it had not been so considerable as some persons supposed. He would, with the permission of the House, state what the increase of that taxation had been during the last 10 years. In 1869 the vestries spent £1,789,281, including payments to the Metropolitan Board of Works. In 1878, or 10 years later, the vestries spent £3,162,771; thus showing an increase in 10 years of about £1,400,000. But while the rateable value of the Metropolis in 1869 was £16,258,000, in 1878 it was £23,470,000, or an increase of £7,212,000. While the net increase of the vestry expenditure in those 10 years was £1,000,000, the following were the principal items of which that increase was composed:—Upon streets and highways the increase was more than £500,000, upon lighting it was £37,000, on payment to the Metropolitan Board of Works £131,000—the vestries now paid £500,000 out of their rates to the Metropolitan Board—and they now paid £500,000 to the School Board rates. The salaries to officers were £46,000 higher than in 1869; when they amounted to £71,000; while, in 1878, they amounted to £117,000. Loans and interest in 1869 amounted to £174,700, and in 1878 to £263,000, or a difference of £88,000. He did not think that the Government could do of their own accord what his hon. Friend asked, and he did not know that the House would support the Secretary of State if he made such a proposition.

SIR ANDREW LUSK asked the House to look at this matter in a fair and broad light. Charges had been made against the vestries; but it should be remembered that vestries were elected under an Act of Parliament, and by the same class of persons as elected Members of Parliament, and if they did not do their work well, the members who composed them might be put out, and others elected in their place. People, no doubt, complained very much about vestries; but so they did about the Members of that House. The thing to do was to change them, and put in better men. He challenged hon. Gentlemen who spoke about the health of the Metropolis to compare it with that of any other city in the world. London was the largest city in the world, and among cities in point of health it stood perfectly unique. What was the use of coming down upon these poor vestrymen and talking about gas and water. The vestries had no more power over the gas and water of the Metropolis than hon. Gentlemen themselves had. When his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir James M'Garel-Hogg) attempted to take up the water supply he was most violently opposed by the Water Companies, and it would be the same with the gas. It was all the Companies, and if you touched them they would say you were attacking private property. No doubt, the rates were heavy; the School Board rate, for example; but the vestries could not help that. Parliament made the law, and the vestries had to carry it out and to find the money. So it was with the main drainage, the fire brigade, the police rate—which was now very heavy—and so on. It was most ungenerous, unhandsome, and undignified to say—“Oh, these are small men, tradesmen.” If they were small men and tradesmen, it was all the more to their credit that they gave a great deal of time to the public good. Hon. Gentlemen talked of the City of London, and spoke of it as a model. He knew something about the City of London, and, no doubt, it was very well managed; but it was very expensively managed. In the City of London there was more to pay than in the Metropolis generally. A good deal had been said about the state of the streets; but Oxford Street was as nicely kept and as clean a street as any in the world, and they had only to go to Marylebone to see streets as well watered, lighted, and cleaned as any in Birmingham, Glasgow, or any other city. It was easy to find fault with the government of the City of London; but it was of such enormous extent, and the interests involved were so vast and so diversified, that he was not surprised that all Ministries were particularly chary in attempting to interfere with it. He had felt it only fair to say a word in favour of the vestries, which had a great deal of hard work to do, and, upon the whole, they did it in an admirable manner. As a rule, they had nothing to do with the expense incurred for luncheons and dinners and wines. The blame, if any, on that score attached to the Guardians; but Boards of Guardians were not peculiar to London, and why blame vestries? There was no mystery or secret about their proceedings, for their meetings were more open than the House of Commons. He quite admitted that the rates were increasing and becoming more onerous, and they could not be too cautious in imposing new burdens.

MR. C. BECKETT-DENISON said, that two years ago he gave Notice of a Motion for a Committee to inquire into vestry management, and especially into the paving, lighting, watering, and scavenging of the streets and houses of London. He had been unable to bring forward that Motion; but if he found encouragement from other Members of the House, he should be inclined to urge upon the House the desirability of appointing such a Committee. He did not think that a single word of blame or censure had been cast on the Metropolitan Board of Works, and very little, indeed, had been said against the vestries. It was not at all necessary to speak offensively or in a hostile manner against the vestries. As the hon. Baronet who had just sat down said, those gentlemen took upon themselves a vast amount of work for no remuneration, and they got a good deal of abuse, especially from people outside, who did not know how difficult their duties were. But he should despair of obtaining any improvement if they acted on the views of the hon. Baronet (Sir Andrew Lusk), whose maxim seemed to be, quieta non movere, and who appeared to think that the government of London, as it was, was the best possible government that could be, and that it could not be improved without additional expense and taxation. He (Mr. C. Beckett-Denison) was not of that opinion; but thought that in one or two respects there was a loud call for improvement and investigation. He referred especially to the watering and scavenging of the streets.

Sir Andrew Lusk

As compared with Paris or other European capitals, the watering of the streets of London was not what it ought to be. A friend of his, who took a great interest in the St. George's Vestry, had told him that the watering and scavengering of the streets of London was practically in the hands of a close monopoly. There were five or six men who tendered in turns to the various parishes. Ostensibly the competition was open; but the contractors had entered into a secret arrangement among themselves by which the contract was always relegated to the same hands. On Sundays the streets were not watered as on other days of the week; and when they considered that the masses of the population took their holiday on that day and visited the parks in immense numbers, they would at once see that on a hot Sunday afternoon, with the wind blowing, the state of the streets of London was a reproach to them. What was the remedy for this? He feared there was none, for the contractors would not allow their carts to go out unless in charge of their own men, and they would not send out their men; and as they would not do the work, no one could do the work which they refused to do. The watering of the streets of London was simply discreditable, and the same thing might be said of the scavengering. It was notorious that there was a regular system of blackmailing in connection with scavengering, and that no one could get his ash-pit cleansed without submitting to it. The result of this was absolute discomfort, uncleanness, and unhealthiness, which they were powerless to remove. It was all very well for powerful people, who could make their voices heard, to say that things were as good as they could be; but it was the poor and the small householders who were really affected. Without bringing any charge of corruption or abuse of authority against the vestries, there was certainly ground for inquiry whether it was not possible to bring about a better state of things. Without any hostility either to the Board of Works or to the vestries, he should, as he had stated, be inclined, if he found any encouragement, to renew his Motion for a Committee of Inquiry with respect to the two special points of watering and scavengering the streets.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR observed, that the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) had introduced the subject in a very broad way, alluding to water supply, gas supply, sanitary arrangements, and so forth; but ended with a Motion which was limited to an inquiry into the question of the vestries and their duties. The great evil in regard to London was that the local government was very defective. Great works were distributed into the hands of a large number of different bodies, and there was no unity. He was, therefore, prepared to vote against the Motion, because it would take away their power to deal with the question in a more satisfactory way, especially when they remembered the Home Secretary's statement that the subject was so large that it would be the duty of the Government to take it up and consider it in all its aspects. But the Motion would throw the inquiry on the vestries, and would remove the responsibility from Parliament. He did not agree with the hon. Member for Finsbury (Sir Andrew Lusk) in the satisfaction he had expressed with the existing state of things. With regard to the water supply, for instance, in some places it was good; but he (Mr. Lyon Playfair) lived in a district which was supplied with water into which 750,000 people poured their excrements before he could drink it. They had been told that there would be another Session of the present Parliament. It would be a capital thing if the Government would deal with this question next Session. He would, therefore, suggest that as they were now getting into a state of things which so operated in the House as to produce the passing of but one Act a Session, the question of improvement in Metropolitan administration should be undertaken next year by the Government, which might thus signalize the last year of their reign by passing at least one comprehensive measure for the promotion of the health of the people. Should the hon. Gentleman withdraw his Motion, the House would be left free to consider a large scheme for Metropolitan local government.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, that they all grumbled at the cost of Metropolitan rates; but it was but fair to give the devil his due, and look at the results which they got for the rates. The Metropolitan rates also, he might say, had not been much raised for the last 10 years. For instance, the total rating of Kensington, from the year 1870 to 1879, averaged 3s. 9d. in the pound; whereas, in the present year, the rating amounted to only 3s. 5d., a decrease of 4d. on the whole, although the charge for the Metropolitan School Board had increased from nothing to 5d., and the Metropolitan Board rate had also increased. He differed from the remarks of his hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury (Sir Andrew Lusk) as to the constitution of the vestries. He thought it required improvement. There was a want of a head and of responsible officers known to the public. As to the complaint that the management of parochial affairs was in the hands of small tradesmen, he thought that gentlemen had themselves to blame in that respect, because it was owing to their negligence that such was the case. If people wished to improve the management of their affairs, they should take a more active part themselves.

Mr. J. R. YORKE said, that this year he had been elected a vestryman for the City of Westminster, and he had been induced to become a member of the Board, not from any motive of public spirit, but from a feeling of curiosity. One heard so much of the working of these bodies that he desired to see the machinery from the inside. No doubt, the majority of those who composed the vestries were small tradesmen; but, considering the nature of the duties they had to discharge, he was not surprised that a great many gentlemen did not care to serve on them. They had to administer the greater portion of their funds under the direction of the Metropolitan Board, and the amount over which they themselves had control was very small. The hon. Member (Mr. C. Beckett-Denison) had stated that the dust was badly laid in the streets on Sundays; and he might say that he was a member of a Street Cleansing Committee for the City of Westminster, and, therefore, he could say that how the matter was done was thus—The contracts were drawn in general terms, the contractors undertaking to keep the streets in proper order under the vestry. The vestry could be set in motion by any ratepayer who chose to communicate with them; and when communicated with they summoned the contractor to produce his books, to show how often he had watered certain streets; and if he was found guilty of neglect he was blown up. He himself had made a complaint that a particular road was not watered properly on the Sunday, and his complaint was attended to, and since then the state of things had been much better. If any hon. Member felt aggrieved in reference to the watering of the streets on Sundays, provided that hon. Member lived in his (Mr. J. R. Yorke's) district, and provided, also, that he would write a letter, he (Mr. J. R. Yorke) would, of course, do his best to see that the matter was attended to. About three autumns ago he was in London for a month, and the condition of the water was at that time intolerable, and it was extremely unpleasant to the nose. The water, he believed, came from the Chelsea Company. He took a sample to Professor Franklin and asked him to analyze it. The Professor told him that he had already analyzed water from the same Company, and showed him a long tube containing some of it, in which he noticed a large number of unpleasant-looking bodies in suspension. He asked would there be any use in filtering the water, but was told that it would be useless, because all the really deleterious matters were to be found in solution, and not in suspension; and, in fact, it was only a question between the thick and the thin turtie. He asked the Professor the nature of the thing, and he said that he found things in the water that led him to believe that they came from Surbiton. There had recently been a flood in that locality, and some of the contents of the cesspools of the place had been washed into the reservoirs. He had naturally since that time kept his eyes open to the quality of the water coming from the Chelsea Waterworks, and he had noticed whether there had been any extensive floods in that neighbourhood, so that he might not drink any more water than he could help. He thought the defence which the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had made for the vestries, that they were not responsible for a great deal of the charges laid at their door, was a just one. He would conclude by saying that if some arrangement could be made for a proper audit of vestry accounts, it would be a real and substantial improvement; and he hoped that, ere long, whenever there might be an opportunity of legislating upon the subject, it would be provided.

Sir George Campbell

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that, to his own knowledge, the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) had been, from the commencement of the Session, endeavouring to obtain a night on which to call the attention of the House to the question of the water supply of the Metropolis, which was a very large question, and ought to be discussed by itself. The hon. Gentleman the Member for the West Riding of Yorkshire (Mr. C. Beckett-Denison), speaking of the watering of the streets, had told them that, in that respect, London was infinitely worse than Paris and other Continental cities. That was so; but then the streets in those cities were watered, not by carts, as in London, but by fixed hydrants; and this question should be discussed on the Water Supply Motion. It should be borne in mind that the population in foreign cities was much more densely concentrated than in London, owing to the practice of the people living in flats; so that the 12 arrondissements which constituted the older City of Paris, as contrasted with the outer ring of 8 arrondissements, were much less in area than the borough he had the honour to represent. Still, he believed considerable improvement had been made within the last few years. As to the paving of London, no one could say that it was all that it ought to be; but considerable improvement had been brought about. The existing boards were becoming alive to the question. As regarded the contracts for scavengering, several vestries had given up the practice of entering into them, and did the work for themselves. It had been said that the London vestries had no permanent officials; but he must say that the vestry clerks, as a rule, were well chosen and very able men, and generally they had served for a great number of years. He hoped that the debate would not close without there being a renewed assurance that the Home Secretary would go into the whole question.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that, considering the terms of the Motion, they might conclude that they had discussed this question enough for all practical purposes. He quite agreed in the general view expressed in the Motion; but he was in this unfortunate position—that different views were entertained with respect to what he said last year. One hon. Gentleman went so far as to state that he had distinctly promised that Government would take up the question and deal with it in the course of the present Session, and had called him over the coals for not having carried that promise to fulfilment; but, certainly, that was not the view of what he had said taken by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe), who had, upon the occasion in question, complained that he had not made any definite statement upon the matter, but had treated it in a light manner as if it were a question of no importance. All he could say was that they were both mistaken. There was, however, no one more sensible of the importance of the question than he was; but then it was one which must be dealt with as a whole, and not in piecemeal. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Peterborough (Mr. Hankey) seemed enamoured of the one idea that the whole of the Metropolis should be included in the City of London. That was a startling proposition, so much so, indeed, that the hon. and gallant Baronet the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board immediately rose from his seat and left the House. If, however, the hon. Gentleman the Member for Peterborough would embody that proposal in a Bill, and submit it to the House, it was probable the hon. and gallant Baronet would remain in his seat and let the hon. Member understand that there were weighty objections to it. As regarded the reform of the City of London, it was a large and serious question, and had been considered by Committee after Committee and by Commission after Commission, which had, no doubt, collected a vast amount of material for Government to deal with, and such was its importance that no person but the Government should attempt to do so. There were, however, several minor points—minor points as regarded the main question, but still of great importance in themselves. Such was the watering of the streets, and such was the efficiency of the fire brigade; but both these questions depended upon a much larger one, which was that of the general water supply. He looked upon that as one of very great importance, for the water supplied for household use was in such a state that it ought to be discontinued. There were a great many minor questions involved in this which ought to be dealt with at once, for he was not one of those who thought that if they could not at once carry some gigantic measure of reform they should not attempt reforms in detail. Besides the defective system of local government in the Metropolis, there was the defective system of vestry administration. He was glad to find that his hon. Friend the Member for East Gloucestershire (Mr. J. R. Yorke) had joined the vestry of his parish, for the great difficulty in the way of the system of local government by vestries was the inability to find gentlemen of ability and social standing to undertake the duties of vestrymen, where they obtained no honour, but had to undertake a great deal of work, and disagreeable work, for which they received no thanks. There was no doubt the nature of the election prevented gentlemen of that class seeking for seats on the vestry; and, therefore, he would at once remove every impediment in the way of obtaining the best men to serve. Some gentlemen were of opinion that the functions of vestrymen were small—they were small in one sense; but in another they were of the utmost importance, as upon them to a large extent depended the comfort, the domestic happiness, the health, and the daily convenience of the inhabitants. In the first place, it was the duty of the vestrymen to see that the house-drains were properly connected with the sewers; but he believed few of them took that trouble. [Mr. J. R. YORKE: They do not.] They had it, then, on the authority of a vestryman that they never did that duty. Again, as regarded the filthy state of the footpaths. The duty of keeping them clean rested with the occupiers of the houses forming the frontage; but if they neglected to do so, then it was for the vestries to step in and put the law in force by compelling them to do so. Then, as to the watering of the streets, he agreed that the system of watering in Paris was superior to theirs. But the watering of the streets and the efficiency of the fire brigade could not, he repeated, be well dealt with apart from the general question of the water supply. He did not wish to put aside that great question; but it would be irregular for him to deal with it until it came before the House as a whole. When the Motions on the

Mr. Assheton Cross

Paper bearing upon these subjects were brought forward, he would be quite prepared to state the views of the Government upon them. He might add, in conclusion, that his hon. Friend had suggested one practical question which was well worthy of consideration, and that was, if they could not obtain a regular Government audit of vestry accounts. That was a subject which, in his (Mr. Assheton Cross's) opinion, must be dealt with before long.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, that after the discussion which had occurred he should, with the permission of the House, withdraw his Amendment.

Question put, and agreed to.

Main Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

RAILWAYS — RAILWAY ACCIDENTS — THE ADOPTION OF CONTINUOUS BRAKES.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. BAXTER, who had on the Paper the following Amendment:—

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is now the duty of the Government to take such measures as may be necessary to secure, within a fixed and reasonable time, the application to all Railway passenger vehicles in the United Kingdom of Continuous Brakes which comply with the conditions laid down by the Board of Trade as essential to public safety;"

said: If the House will give me its attention for a short period, I think I shall be able to state a case so strong that if Members were not convinced, the fault must be with the exponent, and him alone. I think it is incumbent upon me to show to the House, in the first place, that the danger to which we are exposed in railway travelling, and from which the use of proper brakes would save us, is of sufficient importance to call for the interference of Parliament. I hold in my hand an analysis of the railway accidents which have taken place during six years. I find that, between 1870 and 1876, there were 1,234 accidents which were of sufficient importance to be inquired into by officials of the Board of Trade; and of these, 952, or nearly four-fifths, might have been prevented, or mitigated, at all events—so the gentlemen say who have looked into the matter—by the use of efficient brakes. The yearly average of accidents investigated was 176. This large number might have been reduced by 136, in the opinion of the officials, by proper brakes having been used. Several of the accidents which have of late occurred have been of a very disastrous character. In one, at Wigan, 44 persons were killed or injured; at Skipton, 103 persons; at Norwich, 130; at Rip-ton, 72; at Armley Junction, 122; and at Newark, 59. The year 1877, as many hon. Gentlemen will remember, was a year singularly free from railway accidents. During that year 675 passengers and 176 railway servants were killed or injured by accidents to trains; and, applying to this year the proportion of the last six years, I have ascertained that in 1877 nearly 700 persons have sustained injuries by accident which efficient brakes might have prevented. In 1876 the numbers of killed and injured were over 1,300; in 1874 they were nearly 1,600; and the Board of Trade Returns just issued show the numbers killed and injured in 1878 were considerably more than in 1877—1,074 persons being killed or injured last year. I admit at once that these casualties, lamentable as they are, are inconsiderable compared with the enormous number of journeys performed each year—over, I believe, 600,000,000. But the House must keep in mind that the proportion of the public travelling habitually is small; and, therefore, the danger to which they are exposed is confined to a comparatively small number of individuals. I do not for one moment propose to complain of the general management of the railways of this country. On the contrary, when I think of the number of trains continually running, not only in daylight, but in the darkness—running, too, at an enormously high speed—I am filled with admiration at the organization, the skill, and the care which enable us to travel with only those dangers which we do now encounter. But whilst giving the Companies the utmost credit for the degree of safety they have obtained for us, I think the figures I have quoted show conclusively that there are still great dangers to life and limb for which it behoves us to adopt remedial measures. In the second place, it is my duty to show to the House, before inviting Parliament to compel Railway Companies to take such remedial measures, that the Railway Companies have been warned of the state of matters with sufficient urgency, and for a sufficient number of years, to justify the interference of this House. Evidence on this point is very abundant, as the question is no new one. But I will only trouble the House with one or two instances. I have heard hon. Gentlemen say that we have not given the Railway Companies time enough. My answer to that is that as long ago as September, 1858, the Board of Trade issued a Circular, in which they say the amount of brake power then habitually supplied to trains was in most cases insufficient to prevent the occurrence of accidents, and it was essential to the safety of trains going at a high rate of speed that the engine-drivers should have power to stop the trains, having had notice of the obstruction of the line, before they reach the obstructed point. From that day to this, for 20 years, the Board of Trade has been continually knocking at the door of the Railway Companies to give sufficient brake power. I ask hon. Gentlemen do they not read with pain these Returns made every year of the number of casualties, carrying mourning and sorrow into so many homes, seeing that they might have been avoided had proper brakes been adopted? For 20 years the Board of Trade have been warning and remonstrating with the Railway Companies, and one would have thought they would by this time have given up the task in despair, and have called upon Parliament to assist them in enforcing what was required. The tone of remonstrance has now been superseded by one of threatening. This tone culminated in August, 1877, in a very significant intimation—one in which I most cordially approve. Last year was passed an Act which gave warning to Railway Companies that if they did not adopt a proper system of brakes they must be compulsorily interfered with. I have said enough to show that the Companies had warning sufficiently urgent and for sufficiently long a period of time to justify the interference of this House. Now, I am going to lay before the House the manner in which these warnings have been received, and to show the House what has been provided in this essential matter for the public safety. I take, first, the London and North Western Company. They use a brake, regarding which the Board of Trade wrote to the Company in March, 1877, in the following remarkable terms:—

"The Board of Trade desire me again most seriously to urge upon the Directors the necessity of re-considering their system of brakes. Inquiries and experiments have shown that there are brakes which fulfil the conditions mentioned in the Board of Trade Circular, and should the London and North Western Railway Company, after such experience as that afforded by the present case—an accident near Warrington Station, in which the brake was proved to be quite ineffective—hesitate to adopt an efficient continuous brake, and to issue and enforce such regulations as will insure its proper working, the confidence of the public in the earnest and anxious desire of the Company to do all that lies in their power to secure the safety of railway travellers will be at an end; and in the event of a casualty occurring which an efficient system of brake might have prevented a heavy personal responsibility would rest upon those who are answerable for such neglect."

But there is an opposition on the part of the London and North Western Company to give preference to a self-acting brake. At the recent half-yearly meeting, Mr. Moon, the Chairman, stated that the directors set their faces against self-acting brakes; and, further, that he did not believe any man in his senses would say they ought to risk their trains with a self-acting brake. That is a policy which has been most consistently followed by that Company. They have fitted 600 brakes since the Circulars of the Board of Trade were published, every one of which was not in accordance with these conditions. The London and North Western Company not only thought itself powerful enough to treat with absolute contempt and indifference the Circulars of the Board of Trade, but they flew at higher game, and defied the authority of this House. A Royal Commission was appointed in 1874, and reported in 1877 as follows:—

"We recommend that the Railway Companies should be required by law, under adequate penalties, to supply all trains with sufficient brake power to stop them within 500 yards under all circumstances."

Now, this was proposed by men who, according to Mr. Moon, are not in their senses; and he went further, and said Parliament dare not pass such a Resolution. The London and North Western Railway Company carry about one-tenth of the whole passenger traffic of the United Kingdom. The Queen and Royal Family go by it twice a-year to Scotland. Yet on this line they are habitually using a brake so inefficient that the Board of Trade warns the directors that "they incur a personal responsibility by continuing to use it." This is a cogent reason for the interference of Parliament. Then, take the Midland Company, they use six different brakes, some of which are in accordance with the conditions of the Board of Trade, and some of which are not; but, surely, they should be uniform. The Midland Company go in for a large variety of brakes which, I believe, in the end will land them in great confusion and enormous expense. The Great Northern Company adopted a continuous brake at an early period, and showed that they were very enlightened in doing so; but, unfortunately, the brake does not conform to the conditions now laid down by the Board of Trade, and I cannot help thinking that it is unfortunate that the directors should go on making brakes which it is absolutely certain must be replaced very shortly. The Caledonian Company, I am sorry to say, as a Scotchman, have been experimenting with brakes for eight years without any result at all. The North Eastern Company intimated a year ago that they had adopted a brake which they meant to apply over all the system; but I do not find that they have succeeded in carrying out this excellent resolution. I have been informed—rightly or wrongly I do not know—that the Companies, believing that the Government intend immediately to legislate in the sense of the Resolution I have laid upon the Table of the House, have stopped the little progress which they have been making in the matter, and are waiting, with folded hands, to be delivered by this House out of a dilemma which is really painful, but from which, I believe, they are perfectly unable to extricate themselves. I think I have shown the little progress which has been made; but the most alarming fact is that this little progress has been in entirely a wrong direction. The larger proportion of the brakes fitted do not conform to the conditions laid down by the Board of Trade as absolutely essential to the public safety, and to the uniformity which is absolutely necessary. The money part of the question is a subject for the shareholders to decide; and it is time they should see that the majority of the Railway Companies are providing brakes which need not be renewed in a few years' time. But we have to deal with the safety of our countrymen and countrywomen, and if the Railway Companies do not conform to the rules and opinions of the Board of Trade it is time that Parliament should interfere. Just look at the position of other countries with regard to the matter. America is the most advanced of all countries in the adoption of these brakes. There is good reason for that, as most railways in the United States are unfenced. About nine or ten years ago, they began to use continuous brakes. So satisfactory did the plan turn out, that now three-fourths of the passenger vehicles in the United States are so fitted, and the question is being discussed whether they should be applied to goods trains. It is believed in the United States that in two or three years continuous brakes pay for themselves in preventing loss to property and life; and it is a remarkable fact that the Railway Companies find it utterly impossible to get engineers, stokers, or guards to take charge of any train which is not fitted with an efficient brake. I was told the other day, on good authority, that employés of railways in this country—engine-drivers, stokers, and guards—are unanimous in favour of the measure I now propose. In Canada these brakes are in use over half the railways. In Belgium the Government have adopted a brake which is now in use over all the Belgium State Railways. The facts with regard to France are very remarkable. France was very slow to take up this question. A year ago, scarcely a single train in France was fitted with a continuous brake; but now there are as many trains so fitted in France as in the United Kingdom, and they are proceeding at such a rate that they will outdistance us very soon. I will not trouble the House with facts concerning Germany, Austria, and some other countries. All are taking up the question with great interest. Our Australian Colonies and India are also discussing the question; and since I entered this House, I have been informed that the Board of Trade of Holland had recommended the Chambers to compel the Railway Companies of that country to adopt before the 15th of May, 1880, a continuous brake answering, in all respects, to the conditions laid down by the Board of Trade. England does not shine much in this matter, considering the time since we started railways and the wealth we have. What is the explanation of so disappointing and unfortunate a result? I do not think anyone who has watched the progress of this question believes for one moment that Railway Companies have really set to work in earnest to meet the requirements of the Board of Trade in this respect, or the question would have been settled long ago. The jealousy of experts is very well known. Some of them have brakes of their own, and others are interested in brakes which have been invented by their friends. Every Member who is connected with railways, who hears me, knows that this is the fact, and so does the Board of Trade; because in August, 1877, they invited the Railway Companies to consider this matter, and pointed out to them that their officers had not exerted themselves to satisfy the requirements of the public. Well, these differences do exist, and they exist to such an extent, and in such force, that I believe the interference of this House is absolutely necessary. I have no connection whatever with any Railway Company, and I have no connection whatever with any of those Companies which have invented continuous brakes. I never saw one of them, and I do not understand the matter in a mechanical point of view at all. But I do not think that it is necessary that we in the House of Commons should have any such knowledge, because we have a very wise counsellor in the Board of Trade. In looking through the Correspondence which has taken place with the Board of Trade with regard to this matter, I am very much struck with the wisdom which has been shown by that Department. I do not believe that there exists, either in this country or any other country, a Department of a Government which is actuated by so strong a desire to promote the public interests. It would be ridiculous in me to cite authorities in favour of this view; but I must thoroughly endorse a single sentence in a Report recently presented by Mr. Harrison, a Member of the Royal Commission on Railway Accidents, to the North Eastern Railway Company, which is to the following effect:—

Mr. Baxter

“It is hardly necessary to repeat to you what I have recently said, that I entirely agree with the Board of Trade in the conditions laid down by them as being necessary.”

Now, what is the condition of affairs? For 20 years the Board of Trade has been pressing on the Railway Companies the necessity of adopting proper continuous brakes. We find that the Board of Trade, through the Royal Commission, did insist upon certain rules for the guidance of the Railway Companies. We find, further, that in 1877, the Board of Trade laid down the conditions which made up an adequate brake; and we find that in 1878, the Board of Trade, anxious to avoid, if possible, the use of compulsory measures, obtained an Act requiring Railway Companies to make semi-annual Returns of the use of the brakes. What has been the result of all their warnings? Why, we have got into a deadlock—a muddle, if I may so call it—which I believe to be hopeless, and which we shall never get out of by voluntary arrangements. The Board of Trade has done all that it could do in this matter, and done it well. The Railway Companies, it is confessed, are all at sixes and sevens. They have done nothing, or very little, and the little they have done has been so badly done that it will have to be done over again. In these circumstances, I think that Parliament is bound to step in and strengthen the hands of Her Majesty's Government by taking the course recommended in the Resolution which I have placed upon the Table, but which, I am afraid, I am not now able to move—namely,

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is now the duty of the Government to take such measures as may be necessary to secure, within a fixed and reasonable time, the application to all Railway passenger vehicles in the United Kingdom of Continuous Brakes which comply with the conditions laid down by the Board of Trade as essential to public safety."

COLONEL MAKINS: The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Baxter) seemed to assume throughout his remarks that the Railway Companies are anxious to avoid taking the responsibility of accepting these brakes, forgetting that the Companies must, more than anybody else, benefit by getting the best that can be devised. It is true that the Board of Trade have laid down conditions which must be fulfilled; but they have not indicated which of the brakes, in their opinion, best complies with these conditions. We have four or five brakes in the market, all of which claim to fulfil, and some of which, undoubtedly, do fulfil, the conditions brought under our notice. The Companies naturally endeavour to find out, by comparison, which of them is the best for their purpose. To do that, of course, requires a considerable amount of time; but there is another difficulty which the right hon. Gentleman does not recognize, and that is the difficulty the Companies have of getting brakes when they require them. The Company with which I am connected has had in order, for a long time, one of the automatic continuous brakes, and we find it absolutely impossible to get the machinery delivered. It is not a question of cost at all, for the simplest and best brake will, in the end, be the cheapest and it is for the interest of the travelling public, as well as of the Companies, that we should, before finally adopting a general brake for our railway systems find out which is the best and which is the most simple. Of course, if the right hon. Gentleman had been able to move his Resolution, and the House had thought fit to carry it, one effect would have been immediately to cause that difficulty to which I have alluded to be very greatly increased. The patentees of these brakes would naturally have said—"Now that the Government are going to force you to adopt these brakes, we will double the price of them, and we will make a very good market out of your difficulty." That I think would be the first result of any such action on the part of Parliament. Then there is another consideration. All the brakes hitherto invented although they do comply, as far as experiments have gone, with the condition laid down by the Board of Trade, are more or less imperfect. Even those most highly in favour occasionally fail, and we have had failures even of the Westinghouse brake which might have had very serious consequences. Not only engineers and officials, but drivers and guards who use the brakes, are very much divided in opinion as to which is the best. Then the Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman covers the whole ground of our passenger system; and it must be obvious to all acquainted with railway work that it is not necessary to have the same kind of brake for fast and slow trains. For one class of train, you may require a more perfect automatic brake than for the other. There are trains which run over branch and loop lines, which are composed not of passenger carriages only, but of milk vans, horse boxes, and other vehicles, which are detached at various points on the road. For such a train, which is broken up from time to time on its journey, the continuous automatic brake, with its special applications of pipes and valves, would be quite unnecessary; and I should think the House would not desire to impose on the Companies, in trains of this class, the obligation of placing that sort of brake on the whole of the passenger vehicles. Although the right hon. Gentleman says he has nothing to do with the cost, that is a very serious matter when it comes to be considered. The cost of an automatic brake, exclusive of fitting, for engines alone, is about £60, and from £27 to £30 for every other vehicle. The cost of fitting mounts up to a large sum; and, in fact, in the railway to which I have alluded, it would cost from £75,000, to £80,000 to put this brake on all our vehicles. In addition to that, there would be an annual charge for maintenance and repair of some £5,000 or £6,000 a-year more. The directors would not shrink for one moment, even from that large expenditure, if they were certain that they had the best and most efficient brake, and that they would not have to undo their work. The right hon. Gentleman dwelt very properly and forcibly on the folly of spending money on brakes that might hereafter turn out to be inefficient, and I can assure him that it is not the intention of the Companies to adopt any such course. If they have various types of brakes, it is simply because they wish to see by actual experiment which is the best for their purpose. I think it would be a very great pity if this question were pushed on by means of a Resolution of this House; and I am rather glad that, by the Forms of the House, it is impossible that such a thing can be done to-night. I do not complain of the right hon. Gentleman for raising the question, or for the way in which he has treated it, except that I think he spoke with a certain amount of harshness of the Railway Companies, which probably arose more from ignorance than any wish to deal unfairly with them. Having called the attention of the House and Government to this subject, I wish he would press the matter one step further, and ask the Board of Trade, when next they issue a Circular on this subject, to indicate a little more closely which brake they wish the Railway Companies to adopt. They will then relieve us from a considerable amount of embarrassment. They will be accepting a serious amount of responsibility; but we shall know exactly to do what we ought to do.

Mr. Baxter

Mr. ARTHUR PEEL said, he was confident that the Board of Trade would be very glad that the House should express a strong opinion on this important subject, as it would enable them to take up a stronger position towards the Railway Companies than they had heretofore been able to assume. It was remarkable to observe that in the past six years, while accidents from unsuitable or inadequate brake power had increased considerably, other accidents, from defective arrangements of points and signals, had decreased very largely. The conclusion he drew from this comparison was that there were accidents over which there was vast control if they wished to exercise it, and that accidents could be prevented. The hon. and gallant Gentleman, when he was sitting down, said he hoped the House would not be hurried into premature action; but no one could complain of too rapid action on this question. The rate was 3 per cent for the adoption of this system for the engines during the last six months for which the Returns were complete, and 4 per cent for the carriages. The progress had been very slow, indeed, and meantime accidents were occurring and lives were being lost. If there was one thing more monotonous than another in the Blue Books relating to this subject, it was the reiterated complaint of the Railway Inspectors—"If continuous brakes had been in use on this line, the accident would not have occurred," or "the effects of this collision would have been greatly modified." Reference had been made to expense. He had read that the cost of fitting the brake to an engine would be £100, and to a carriage £35; but he would ask the House to remember the expense the Railway Companies had gone to in applying different systems, simply from the absence of agreement among themselves to adopt one which excelled the others. The Americans had adopted the system of continuous brakes, and they found that the expense had been amply repaid by the increased safety of the traffic. Nobody supposed that one general system of continuous brakes could be established for all time. That was not what was asked. What was asked was this—that each Railway Company should adopt for itself a system of continuous brakes, which complied with conditions founded on just and true experience. The system of through trains now running on the Great Northern, North Eastern, and North British, showed that there was no difficulty in regard to traffic passing over several lines. Reference had been made by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Baxter) to what was doing in foreign countries; and he showed that France in a short time would have all its railways supplied with efficient brakes, while the English Companies were wrangling with the Board of Trade. It was strange that the Chairman of the London and North Western Railway Company could have said what he had, with the recollection of an accident which occurred on his own line in 1877, which was of a peculiar character, and forcibly illustrated the necessity for continuous brakes. There was a gap in the line, 30 yards having been taken up, and of this there was 1,500 yards' notice to the driver of a train approaching at the rate of 40 miles an hour. It plunged into the gap at the rate of six miles an hour. An immediate examination showed that some tires were cold, some lukewarm, and some hot, showing that the brakes, under the management of four men, had been applied at four different times. Could anything more strongly illustrate the necessity of having a continuous brake system worked by one man from the engine and on his own responsibility? He (Mr. Peel) was unwilling that attention should be called to this subject by any director being killed, on whichever side of the House he might sit. But he thought they would have had continuous brakes before this if a director had been in the position of a guard on an Irish railway, who, in the year 1878, was in a carriage, two wheels of which were off the line, and who had to go for three miles in that perilous position before the train could be stopped. There was no difficulty in pulling up and stopping a train of 100 or 200 tons while travelling at 40 miles an hour, within a distance of 200 yards; that difficulty had been got over; the important point was that there should be automatic action of the brake, and that information should be given to the man in charge the moment the brake ceased to be in perfect working order. To say that men would rely too much on a magnificent instrument was an odd argument against giving it to them for the protection of life. The failures that had occurred with continuous brakes furnished no argument against the principle of them, though they might tell against the mechanism of some particular application. Any system they could devise would fail, just as the energies of the human mind fail, or the physical powers of the human body would fail. The interlocking and block systems and other improvements occasionally failed; but that was no argument against their general utility. But the time had come when the Board of Trade ought to say to the Companies that they must agree among themselves upon some system or systems to be generally available over their lines. Of course, on small branch lines, where trains did not attain more than 25 miles an hour, it would not be necessary to provide the same brake power as for trains of a higher speed. He did not advocate compulsion or uniformity, for he objected to the State management of railways; and it would be only in the event of the Companies proceeding at too slow a pace that the State should interfere with their independent action.

MR. TENNANT said, that as a railway director he was exceedingly glad that this question had been brought forward. A discussion had taken place, and the views of hon. Members on the question could not fail to prove impressive, and they would be quite as effectual as the passage of an Act of Parliament, or even an Order made by the Board of Trade. He thought the time had arrived when some further pressure should be put upon railways in this direction. For the last four or five years experiments had been going on—experiments of every sort and every description of brake, whether steam, air, water, or any kind of mechanical contrivance. But although many of the brakes now in use complied with several of the requirements of the Board of Trade, yet he thought everyone must admit that no perfect brake had yet been found; and until that perfect brake, or one answering every requisite for the safety of the travelling public, was found, it would be most unwise to put power in the hands of any Department to insist upon the universal adoption of any particular brake. There were, he believed, some 40 or 50 different descriptions of brakes that had been applied on different lines. Two or three of them, perhaps, would answer most of the requirements of the Board of Trade; and he believed there was one which might be said to answer almost all of the requirements, but even that was, in some respects, imperfect; but until it was known which particular brake was to be the brake of the future, he thought it would be most unwise to interfere by any compulsory action. The Railway Companies had not been so inactive in the matter as some hon. Members thought. Upon no fewer than 70 of our railway systems continuous brakes had been in operation during the last few years; and from the last Return of the Board of Trade it would be found that nearly 800 locomotive engines, and over 8,000 passenger carriages, had been fitted with a continuous brake. This, at a moderate cost, must have cost upwards of £250,000. As, however, there were nearly 4,000 locomotives and upwards of 30,000 passenger carriages used on the various railways of the United Kingdom, it might be said this was not a large proportion, and that there was ample scope for further experiments until this great deficiency was supplied. It would, of course, be invidious to call attention to particular railways; yet, as might be seen from the Return, there were many Companies that had done little or nothing in the way of adopting continuous brakes, while others had fitted up the greater portion of their rolling stock with them. There was need for pressure; and he, for one, should certainly maintain that the only question was how, and by what means, and to what extent, should that pressure be applied. It was now almost universally admitted that the modern appliances which had of late years been introduced into our railway system, such as the communication between drivers and guards, continuous foot boards, block signals, interlocking apparatus, and other minor improvements, had contributed largely to the diminishing of accidents; consequently those appliances, although expensive, had done good. And, setting aside the saving of life and limb, they had been an improvement even in a pecuniary point of view. Therefore, it was to the interest of the Companies, considering the matter on the lowest basis, to adopt every such improvement. These appliances, introduced of late years, were at first looked upon with disfavour by the Companies, and with indifference by the public; and it was only fair to say that their adoption was mainly brought about through the instrumentality of the Board of Trade. It was only due to the Board of Trade that this should be publicly stated, because they had no direct power to enforce the adoption of any of those improvements to which he had referred, but by the pressure they had continuously applied they had been able to effect these desirable objects; and he could not help thinking that even in this case, after the expression of opinion of this House, and after the expression of public opinion, which, no doubt, would immediately follow, that they would be able without any special Act to bring about a general adoption of continuous brakes. At all events, until it had been seen that they had failed to accomplish this, he thought it would be unwise to interfere compulsorily. There was, he believed, only one instance on record where direct legislative action had been brought to bear upon the application of any appliance upon our railway system. The Act of 1868 directed that some such efficient means of communication should be provided between drivers, guards, and passengers of trains as met with the approval of the Board of Trade. The Board of Trade signified their approval of a particular form of communication, and that form of communication was adopted by the railways; but for some reason or other the approval of the Board of Trade was soon withdrawn, and the Act of Parliament, therefore, became a dead letter. Assuming that the same course would be pursued in this case as was in that of communication between driver and guard, and it were provided that some specific continuous brake power should be applied to every train, it might so happen that the Board of Trade would specify a brake which, within a very short time, might be found not to be the best brake, and the consequence would be that the regulation would be disregarded, and the Act itself rendered worse than useless. That, he thought, would not be a very nice state of things to bring about; and he, therefore, objected to any direct Parliamentary interference until it had been shown what was the best sort of brake to be used. It would be desirable, before the Board of Trade issued any further notices of this kind to Railway Companies, that they should satisfy themselves more fully as to the requirements of railways. He himself would have suggested that there should have been some public trial, under the supervision of the Board of Trade, of every system of brake that was known to be in use on the various lines in the Kingdom, and that the trial should take place before a competent, and unprejudiced, and unbiassed body of men; because he quite agreed that there was a great deal of jealousy and partizanship on the part of the locomotive engineers and railway officials, which certainly had not tended to produce, so far, the best results. Engineers seemed to make up their minds in favour of one or other particular form of brake or principle, and they devoted all their energies, not towards improvement of continuous brake power in general, but towards the improvement of some particular principle they approved of, even to the exclusion of other systems. Such a trial, properly conducted, would conduce to the best solution of the difficulty, and they would thus have a reliable and unbiassed opinion as to which brake answered all the requirements most fully and effectually, and whether the brake selected might not still further be improved by the adoption and combination of some part or principle taken from another brake. He could not but think that Railway Companies would avail themselves of a brake which answered all the best requirements; because it was too manifestly to their interest, indirectly as competitors for traffic, and directly in the saving of life, that even if improvement generally considered efficient should be adopted in the system of railway brakes. The Board of Trade, no doubt, possessed the power of instituting this trial with the concurrence of the various Railway Companies, and that would be freely accorded; but, for the reasons he had stated, he should deprecate any action by the House to clothe the Board of Trade with imperative power to enforce the adoption of a particular brake. He certainly, however, was very glad that the subject had been brought under discussion. He wished to make a few remarks in reply to the right hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter). He thought he was rather severe in his strictures on some railways. Speaking for the line with which he himself was connected, he could say that they had introduced a number of improvements, and he believed it was among the foremost to introduce the continuous brake; but the right hon. Member took exception to the introduction of a brake that did not comply with the requirements of the Board. He was not prepared to say that the brake they had in use did comply with the requirements of the Board; but he was happy to think that, at a comparatively light cost it might either be altered to suit the particular brake which the Board of Trade desired to introduce, and he believed the brake itself might be made automatic. But one condition laid down by the Board of Trade appeared to him to be a condition that could not possibly be complied with. The words were—"In case of accident to be instantaneously self-acting." He could not conceive it possible that any brake could be instantaneously self-acting in every accident. A fruitful source of accident was the breaking or failure of axle, or tires, or wheels, or working. An accident might not affect the mechanism of the brake. It might be possible to apply the brake and this showed the danger of laying down general principles of such a nature as this; and such specific definitions, on the other hand, would be laying upon the Board of Trade the responsibility which was now thrown upon the Railway Companies. He, for one, speaking quite apart from railway interest should be exceedingly sorry to see the responsibility impaired or diminished for he was perfectly certain that it was the best safeguard they had. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Baxter) had referred to America; but it must not be forgotten that in America they had not the block signals which were in operation in this country, and that alone did away, in great measure, with the necessity of continuous brakes. He did not at all mean to say that continuous brakes were not an additional protection. He believed they were, and that the time would come when they would be universally in use. But it was scarcely fair to institute a comparison with America unless the circumstances were similar. He had only to say, in conclusion, that he should be exceedingly glad if any means could be devised by which the Board of Trade should be clothed with additional powers to bring further pressure to bear upon the Railway Companies. But whatever action was taken he hoped the responsibility would not be transferred from the Companies to the Board of Trade, for if that were done one of the best safeguards to the travelling public would disappear.

Mr. Arthur Peel

Mr. Tennant

MR. KNOWLES thought the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) had done good service in calling attention to this very important and interesting, though complicated, subject. It was a very easy matter for the Board of Trade to compel the adoption of some particular system of brake; but very difficult for Railway Companies with enormous rolling stock to apply it. The London and North Western Company, for instance, upon which a severe attack had been made, possessed a rolling stock of 2,000 locomotives, 5,000 carriages, besides a very large number of trucks, cattle waggons, and other vehicles, and to such a Company it would be extremely difficult to adopt brakes which any crotchety person might introduce. He used this word, because, in reality, there were a good many crotchety people who invented brakes which were never brought to perfection. The majority of the inventions generally went smoothly on trial; but when they came to be put into practice they very frequently resulted in absolute failure. He could speak on behalf of the London and North Western Railway Company in this matter, and he had no hesitation in saying that they, as well as other Companies, were fully alive to the fact that it was to the interest of the shareholders to adopt the best practical means which would conduce to the safety of the public. They had, he might say, the fullest confidence in their engineer, who was, he believed, more competent for the performance of the duties which he had to perform than anybody connected with the Board of Trade. Little or no allusion had been made in the course of the debate to the block system. He attached a great deal more importance to the block system than to the continuous brakes. That system conduced more to the safety of the public than continuous brakes would; and if the system were only thoroughly applied in every instance, little would be heard about such brakes as it was now desired the Board of Trade should enforce. He was inclined to ask if people were quite sure that continuous brakes would prevent accidents, because he had heard very different opinions expressed on the subject. He had heard good engineers and most ingenious people say that when the block system was properly applied, and men did their duty, the public were safer and better without the continuous brake than with it. Continuous brakes were, no doubt suited to the peculiar circumstances of American railways; but in regard to England, trains were signalled from station to station, and the permanent way properly fenced in and free from obstacles. He agreed with those people who had doubts as to the wisdom of adopting continuous brakes on our railways. The Railway Companies were in no way ceasing in their efforts; but were unanimous in their desire to do all they could to protect the public; and, immense as was the traffic now, the accidents were far less than those in 1856. He asked in conclusion, whether, during the "battle of the brakes," which was still going on, it would not be preferable for the Board of Trade, as the guardians of the public, and also for the public themselves, that these things should be matured by the railways themselves, and by the ingenious gentlemen who were trying all sorts of experiments, rather than that the Government should insist upon any kind of brake, or upon what should be done at the present moment, and thus take upon itself the responsibility of that matter? He did not think the Government would do that, but that they would leave the responsibility on the shoulders of those upon whom it now rested.

MR. LEEMAN: The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Knowles) has expressed views with which I must say I cannot agree. He has stated them very broadly, and I assume that they embrace the views of the whole of the directorate and of the engineer of the London and North Western Railway. Those views are opposed to the principle of continuous brakes; and he gives us that statement as a reason against the indictment of the right hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) that the North Western continue to adopt a system of brake power which is not adopted on any other railway in the immediate neighbourhood, or, so far as I am aware, throughout the country. The hon. Gentleman told us also that his Board had a very confident opinion of the excellent qualities of their engineer. Well, Sir, other Companies have got engineers, and they do not, at all events, in the immediate neighbourhood of the London and North Western, agree with the engineer of the London and North Western. Let me say that the gentleman to whom the right hon. Member for Montrose referred at the outset of this debate, Mr. Harrison, a man whose experience, at all events, has not been exceeded by any other engineer of this country, who has probably made more railways and public works than most men, who has been as well acquainted with the working of the railways in the North of England, and who, in the first instance, entertained very considerable doubt as to the precise principle and system to be adopted with regard to brakes, has come to an entirely opposite opinion to that expressed by the hon. Member who has just spoken, and that of the engineer of the London and North Western Railway. My right hon. Friend quoted the opinion expressed by Mr. Harrison on this subject some months ago. Sir, I hold in my hand the views entertained by Mr. Harrison, though there are parts of this communication which I shall not read, for I think it would be a great pity if we were to allow ourselves to enter into a consideration of the relative merits of different systems of brakes. I think some hon. Gentleman spoke of there being 70 systems of brakes in competition. Well, I have only heard of eight. There are only eight spoken of in the Report of the Parliamentary Commission, which lay claim to having been considerably experimented upon. But I had thought that, on the simple question of principle, all these experiments had led up to a result which the Commissioners who sat upon the Bill came to, and came to unanimously—namely, that the principle of continuous and systematic brakes was that which was required for the public safety. Well, Sir, as I have said, these Gentlemen having heard all the evidence, Mr. Harrison, who was a practical member of that Commission, joined in that Report, and in a letter which he wrote to me, as Chairman of the North Eastern Railway, he said—

“ The question of brake power is one of such great importance, and so many different views and opinions are held about it, that I have thought it right to put in writing, for your information, my own views and the conclusions I have arrived at after most careful consideration of the whole subject. I will refer briefly to the circumstances which led the Railway Accidents Commissioners to make the recommendations they did in their Report. The evidence given by guards, engine-drivers, and others, soon showed that they had no accurate means of ascertaining the distance within which a train, at any given speed and with a given amount of brake power, could be brought to a state of rest; in fact, the distances, they stated, were mere guesses. A series of experiments were undertaken, and they showed that in the normal condition of express trains, as then running on the principal lines in the Kingdom, it required a distance of from 800 to 1,200 yards to bring them to a state of rest when travelling at 45, to 48½ miles an hour, this being much below the ordinary travelling speed of the fastest express train. Railway officials were not prepared for this result, and the necessity for a great deal more brake power was at once admitted. The Commissioners, after hearing a great deal of evidence, both before and after the experiments, recommended, in their Report, that sufficient brake power should be applied to every train to bring it to an absolute stop in 500 yards; and you will see at once that though some of the general managers thought there was no difficulty in doing this in 300 or 400 yards, the Commissioners, in fixing 500 yards, looked at all the varying circumstances of bad weather, slippery rails, and bad gradients.”

I would here call your attention to the fact that all the engine-men and guards examined gave evidence as to the necessity of having the control of the brake power primarily in the hands of the engine-men, but that the guards should also have a given amount of brake power. I now come to an officer of the Board of Trade, and one, at the time I quote, exclusively their officer. What did he say, in 1874? I am confining myself, at this moment, to the question of principle—namely, whether the continuous automatic brake, or whether that to which the London and North Western, or one of those to which some other large railways hold, is the right one. The Commissioners quote Captain Tyler's Report of 1874—

“ That the brake should be applied at the will of the engine-drivers, and available in each part in the event of the train becoming suddenly divided.”

This means that the brake should be automatic, and the inspecting officers of the Board of Trade frequently refer to this point in their Reports on accidents, and express the opinion that in several cases the serious effects of accidents have been, and in others would have been, diminished by the action of the automatic brake. Mr Harrison goes on—

Mr. Leeman

“My own opinion is strong that a really efficient brake should be continuous; that it should be primarily under the control of the engine driver; that when necessary, in emergencies, the guard should have the power of applying it, and that it should be automatic in its action, in case of a train dividing from any cause, and that it should be, as nearly as possible, instantaneous in its action.”

Now that, I repeat, is the opinion of as practical a man as any in the Kingdom. Well, the Board of Trade, holding the same views, sent to the Railway Companies, and urged upon them that they should take into consideration the views which had been expressed by the Railway Commission, of which Mr. Harrison was a Member, in the Report, and which I do not think I need refer to further, but upon which the Board of Trade have been asking that the different railways should adopt the principle of instantaneous automatic action. That is the requirement which has been made to all the railways in the Kingdom, not the adoption of any specific brake. Acting upon that requirement, the North Eastern Company at once set to work and adopted a system of brake fulfilling those requirements on their own railway. But there is no doubt that what has been said by the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Tennant) is quite true. There is the greatest possible difficulty in the case of half-a-dozen railways going into one another's lines. The brake of the North Western system, of which the House has heard, comes upon the North Eastern system at Leeds and Normanton. See the difficulty which arises. No doubt, it is a practical difficulty; and the Board of Trade will tell you to-night, as they have told you on former occasions, that they will not take the responsibility of determining these difficulties. They are as cautious as possible; but in regard to the question of uniformity of brake, they feel the difficulty of determining which is the best. There is one principle, however, which stands prominently forward, that of the brake being continuous and automatic, on which they are fortified by the opinions expressed by the Commissioners, but beyond that they do not go. When the responsibility is left to the Railway Companies themselves, one Company cannot determine what brake shall be adopted by the other Railway Companies. Expense has been talked of; but I do not believe the Railway Companies would allow expense in this matter of brakes, any more than in the block system, to stand in the way. Whatever will increase the safety of the public on the lines of railway will, I believe, in the long run, bring to the Railway Companies a diminution of cost in that ugly item of compensation. That the principle of continuous and automatic brakes is the safest that could be adopted was the unanimous conviction of the North Eastern Company, and as soon as we were satisfied of this, we communicated it to the Board of Trade. Well, Sir, I am not sorry that this discussion has taken place, for I hope it will show the public that these matters are being very carefully considered. I do not know what the noble Viscount the President of the Board will do; but this I will say—that I should be very sorry if it were supposed for a moment that directors do not reflect on what is best for the safety of our passengers. You have heard that the Great Northern Railway Company have considered the best mode of carrying their traffic; and, although theirs is a different brake to ours, the North Eastern at present carries on the traffic that comes from London to York forward to Edinburgh and the whole of Scotland. Persons should not be alarmed at the idea of carriages being pulled up within 500 yards. A great many experiments have been tried in different parts of the country, and the result of those experiments has been to show clearly that we can do what was supposed years ago to be utterly impracticable. The following is the result of experiments made by the Commission itself, and must be taken, therefore, as bonâ fide—it is the Report of men who are uninfluenced in any way in favour of any particular brake—namely, the Commissioners themselves, presided over by a most practical man in the Duke of Buckingham. Upon the experiments made for the use of the Commission, they say—level ground at given speeds might be brought to rest in cases of emergency, and these we should base on a stoppage similar to that before-mentioned—namely, that of 275 yards for a speed of 50 miles an hour, making a correction for speeds up to 60 and down to 30 miles an hour, in proportion to the squares of the rapidity, nearly as follows:—Running at 60 miles per hour, to pull up in 400 yards; 55 miles, 340 yards; 50 miles, 275 yards; 45 miles, 220 yards; 40 miles, 180 yards; 35 miles, 135 yards; 30 miles, 100 yards."

“On the whole, therefore, we think that if it be desirable to give to Railway Companies a rule for the future, the only plan will be to lay down the distances within which trains travelling on

Now, the maximum required by the Royal Commission is 500 yards. The Board of Trade, however, say that brakes must be instantaneous in their application. But to show the importance of coming to a right comparison between one system and another, it should be borne in mind, as stated by Mr. Harrison, that a loss of one second in getting the brakes in full action means a loss of 30 yards in distance; of two seconds, 60 yards; and of three seconds, 90 yards. When you consider this, the importance of the word "instantaneous" is appreciated. I must ask the House, in considering the question brought before it, to bear in mind the various circumstances to which I have adverted.

Mr. C. BECKETT-DENISON said, that the House was engaged in a discussion of a highly technical character, and he was somewhat surprised that so abstruse a mechanical point as the working of an automatic instantaneous continuous brake should have been made the subject of a positive Resolution by a Member of that House who had had no actual experience of the superiority of one kind of brake over another. He hoped, however, that they would not be dragged into the discussion of the merits of any particular kind of brake. Railway directors did not object to, but would, on the contrary, accept with gladness, the authority of the Board of Trade, wherever that authority was intelligently and wisely exercised. But a difference arose as to the principle of automatic and instantaneous action. It was very difficult to understand that difference, and he should despair of making it intelligible to gentlemen who had not had the means of informing themselves as to the arcana of its working. It was one thing to get a brake on to the wheels, and quite another to get it off again. Without expressing any opinion as to the merits of any particular invention, he might say that at this moment there was not one in existence that was not subject to sudden derangement or accident in the regular working of trains. He might give an instance of an accident which came under his personal knowledge. It was the breaking of an axle on a Scotch express. The whole train was fitted with continuous and automatic brakes, and what was the result? The train stopped to a certain degree; but was not thoroughly stopped. Some of the carriages dragged and got off the line, and the engine-driver saw that the only safety for himself and those under his charge was by making the train stop and bringing it quietly up to a stop. The brake in this instance had been applied; but by the swaying of the carriages the connecting tube was broken, but the engine-driver was thus enabled to avert a very serious accident. He would be sorry if the Board of Trade should make itself the patron, exponent or advertiser of the mechanical invention of any particular patentee. That was not what was desired in a great Department of Government. Let all the inventions stand upon their own merit. The House had heard from the hon. Member for York (Mr. Leeman) what was Mr. Harrison's opinion. The opinion of that gentleman was entitled to the greatest respect; but all the most able with the least able were liable to a bias in one direction or another. The hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Tennant) had suggested that the Board of Trade should have a compulsory trial of all the continuous automatic brakes now competing for public favour. But he had one objection to that—and this had been in a measure anticipated by the hon. Member for Wigan—that was, that the experiments made under what might be called fair weather conditions, with train prepared with guards, official directors, and patentees all present, insure the success of the experiments was not the sort of success to stand the wear and tear of every-day work. That was one difficulty in the way of an authoritative trial; and another objection was that every month of the year, and almost every week of the month, brought nearer and nearer a solution of the question. There were inventions coming out every day, and it would be a grave misfortune if, by the premature action of that House or of the Board of Trade, the travelling public and the railway interest were to be deprived of the be-invention. He was not at all opposed to pressure of a gentle and proper kind being brought to bear on the companies, to ensure that they did not go to sleep, and to show that the public would not submit to an indefinite retardation of the subject; but it was also of the utmost importance that the companies should not get into a wrong groove, from which there would be no return. With these remarks he would quit the question; and, speaking for the board of which he was a member, they would hail with the greatest satisfaction any invention fulfilling the conditions all must admit were essential to the public safety.

Mr. Leeman

Mr. MACDONALD said, this question did not affect Railway Companies merely, or the public who travelled by fast trains. It affected in a very special manner working men employed on trains carrying heavy material, which were liable to many and grievous accidents. He hoped that when the question should be brought up again, it would be dealt with in relation to trains carrying heavy material. He trusted that the wisdom which had guided the Board of Trade hitherto would prevent it from giving a preference to any particular brake, but would content itself with laying down certain requisite conditions to be complied with, leaving to Railway Companies to choose any one brake which complied with these conditions; otherwise, when an accident happened, the railway companies would say that they had carried out the will of the Department, and the result was the accident which had occurred.

Mr. HICK said, the subject was one of very great interest and importance, and he, and every hon. Member present, would appreciate the motives which had induced the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) to bring it forward; but he could not agree with the right hon. Gentleman's views when he laid so much stress upon the want of brake-power as the cause of so many accidents. He (Mr. Hick) admitted that there were many accidents due to this cause, but not nearly so many as the right hon. Gentleman attributed to it. The right hon. Gentleman was rather severe on the London and North Western Railway, of which he (Mr. Hick) had the honour of being a director; but he felt quite sure that no body of directors in the country paid more attention to securing the safe working of the line than did the London and North Western. For a considerable number of years they had been making experiments to find the best kind of brake, and he quite agreed that it was of paramount importance to have a continuous effective brake. He must say a few words in reference to a remark attributed to Mr. Moon by the right hon. Member for Montrose. Mr. Moon was said to have expressed an opinion "that a man must be out of his senses to trust his safety to an automatic brake." Mr. Moon must have referred only to such brakes as railways had before them, and in that he (Mr. Hick) quite agreed. He would be sorry to trust to any automatic brake he knew, for they were very uncertain in their action, and, so far from preventing accidents, some day they would lead to an accident. Speaking from a long mechanical experience, he regarded all automatic machinery with distrust. You could not depend on your material to such an extent but that there might be some flaw, and he would much rather trust machinery and its application where the watchful eye of a skilful and careful man was necessary. He argued, also, that it would be a bad policy for the Board of Trade to interfere and support any particular brake. It would be a dangerous step. It would remove all responsibility from the Railway Companies, and there would be a check to all improvements and new inventions. He was quite sure that all connected with railways were agreed that anything calculated to prevent accidents should be adopted. The London and North Western Company had not been slow in trying experiments with brakes of various kinds. Something like £100,000 they had spent already; but cost was not an element in their consideration. A good deal had been said about the company taking up an invention of one of their officers; but why should they not, if the inventor was—as the company believed he was—one of the cleverest engineers to be found? He (Mr. Hick) fully believed their engineer was one of the ablest railway engineers in England. He had, in connection with another gentleman, been fortunate enough to invent a brake that the company, after careful experiments, had adopted. The invention was now undergoing alteration. Experiments and improvements were being made upon it, and only to-day orders had been given for the application of certain improvements of the greatest consequence. He did not know any better brake than the Clark and Webb brake used by the London and North Western Railway; and he believed, when it was made as perfect as it could be made, no brake in the country would equal it, and, certainly, there was no brake in the country under which he should consider himself so safe from accident. He would only further say he regretted such strong remarks should have been made in regard to the North Western, because he was sure that if the directors knew of a brake, invented by anyone and better than their own, they would not hesitate to adopt it at any cost. In conclusion, he would say that if they were actuated by no other motive than that of self-interest they should do all in their power to adopt means for the prevention of accidents, but he trusted they had far higher inducements. Could it be thought that they cared nothing for mutilated limbs? Nothing for the painful and sometimes sudden deaths, or that they had no sympathy with the sufferings and sorrows of the bereaved? He could assure the House that they, and all who had anything to do with the management and the working of railways, felt these things deeply, and should not relax in their exertions until they had devised and adopted means which should render the occurrence of these accidents—as far as was practicable—impossible.

LORD RICHARD GROSVENOR said, this question had been before the directors of the London and North Western Company for the last 20 years. Clarke's brake was, after very great consideration, adopted by that company. It was improved by Mr. Webb, their engineer, then second in command, and it had since been called Clarke and Webb's brake, but it was not originally invented by an officer of the company. Modifications were being made in it, and there would be little doubt it was the brake most likely, with improvements, to fulfil all the conditions required by the Board of Trade. He would not have ventured to mention this brake, in contradistinction to all others, if the London and North Western Company had not been so particularly alluded to in the course of the evening. The directors of that company were fully alive to the importance of continuous brakes, but there was a little fashion in these matters. At one time the salvation of passengers was to the interlocking system, at another time communication between passengers and guard, and then again continuous brakes were to bring about the result they wished for. The directors of the London and North Western Company believed that in the prevention of accidents much was due to the management and discipline of the whole line in case of a momentary failure of any individual part of the machinery. Reference had been made to the readiness with which continuous brakes were adopted in America; but he wished to point out that there, owing to the greater length of the carriages, there were much fewer couplings and joinings. He did not join in the recommendation of his hon. Friend the Member for Leeds (Mr. Tennant) that the Board of Trade should institute any authoritative trials of brakes, as they already had the result of the Newark trials, which showed that could be done; nor did he join in the other recommendation, that the Board of Trade should force any particular brake upon Railway Companies. He believed such a course would defeat its own object and effect no good. What was desired was a brake that could be depended upon at all times. The present discussion had shown that railway directors were alive to the necessities of the case, and he honestly believed that they were only anxious to secure the best form of brake that could be attained. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose had stated that France had gone farther ahead than England in the matter of railway brakes, but if he inquired into the facts, he would find that the Northern of France had adopted one of the brakes in the second category of the Board of Trade which did not carry out all the requirements.

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, I feel confident that the House will agree with me that the course of this debate has fully justified the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Baxter) in bringing the subject forward. Not a single hon. Member has got up who has not expressed gratitude to him for having raised the subject, and I think with them that that gratitude is justly due. We were much interested in the very careful and temperate speech which he made, and we are much indebted to him for bringing this subject prominently before the public. My hon. Friend the Member for Warwick (Mr. Arthur Peel), the Seconder of the Motion, who also has a large acquaintance with these matters, no less deserves our gratitude, as he has contributed to the discussion the result of experience which he gained during the time of his connection, as a Member of the Government, with the Board of Trade. Further than this, I am willing to agree heartily with my right hon. Friend opposite in his opening remarks—that is to say, I join with him most cordially in expressing the pride which we all must feel with respect to the generally very able management of our great railway lines. My right hon. Friend bore ungrudging testimony on that point, and I think there is no one living in these Three Kingdoms who does not feel that he has a right to be proud both of the high character and the devotion to business of the directors, and of the great scientific acquirements and equally high character of that noble class of railway officers who control and manage the marvellous means of communication which we now enjoy. Whether you look at those men of high genius, capacity, and skill, who are the working heads of these immense undertakings, or whether you look to those whose hands carry on this complicated traffic, we have every reason to be proud of the way in which our railway system is managed. But, having said so much, I must venture to remind those who have spoken on behalf of the railway interest, and who have claimed for themselves, I cannot but think somewhat too strongly, the credit for doing and having done all that the public safety and convenience require, that a great number of the improvements that have been made have been the result of very considerable pressure from public opinion, from Parliament, and, I may also venture to say, from the Board of Trade, as representing the general public opinion of the country. I cannot forget all that has taken place of late years respecting the interlocking of signals and points, the block system, and other matters. Although I am willing to bear the strongest testimony, as far as I can properly do so, to the high merits of those who work the railway system, yet I must remind them that a good deal of their success in providing for the safety and comfort of the public has, after all, been owing to the pressure from out-of-doors. This, I think, is a matter of history which we should always remember when these subjects are discussed. Now, we must be very ignorant of human nature if we overlook the fact that, however honestly desirous the managers of these vast concerns may be to meet the requirements of the public, for a manager or engineer, or any of the great heads of departments in the railroads, to go before the board of directors, asking them, except under the pressure of a terrible accident, or with very good cause, to spend vast sums of money, in altering their plant, machinery, or anything else, is not a very agreeable thing for these gentlemen to do. Nor, again, can it be very agreeable to the directors themselves of these great concerns to go before a shareholders' meeting, and to say we are obliged to diminish your dividend, already, perhaps, not over large owing to bad times, because we want to spend, say £80,000, upon fitting brakes to all our engines and carriages, to use the figure which my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for South Essex (Colonel Makins) informed us would be the cost of the introduction of continuous brakes on his line. That £80,000 would represent a great lump out of the earnings of the shareholders; so it is only human nature that people responsible to those who embark their money in these concerns should be a little shy of undertaking these large improvements, however favourable in the abstract they may be to public safety, unless great pressure is put upon them from outside. For that reason, we ought to be grateful to hon. Members who from time to time bring these matters of public safety and convenience before us in Parliament; and if I needed justification for this remark, I should be well content to rest it upon the tone which has been adopted by all railway directors to-night. There is hardly a director of high position connected with a leading line, who has spoken, that has not said that, on the whole, he is glad this pressure was put upon them. This is quite a sufficient reward for my right hon. Friend opposite, and quite a sufficient justification for a Motion of this kind. I have been asked, whether or not I should be inclined to encourage legislation on these specific points? I would ask hon. Members to consider carefully how we got the great results respecting interlocking, the block system, and other leading improvements, the importance of which is now generally acknowledged? We did not get these results by legislation. We got them in a different way; a way more in accord with the habits, feelings, and best traditions of the country. These improvements have not been ordered by Parliament, nor by the Board of Trade; but you have got them by throwing the strong light of publicity upon the action of the Companies as to these proceedings. You obliged them to make periodical Returns, so that the Companies felt that all they did in these matters would be widely known and widely discussed. Well, surely, after such successes, it would be a very rash thing on our part to depart from the long usage of the Board of Trade in this matter, which has led to such results, unless under pressure of some overwhelming necessity. Not only have we required these Returns, but, of course, a large part of our later system has been to establish a careful examination into all railway accidents, and a careful classification of the causes which we believe have led to these accidents. To sum up, our system has been to rely for bringing about improvements in the management and apparatus of our railways, upon careful examination into accidents by experts, under the direction of the State, upon the publicity of the results of such inquiries, and upon the publication by the railways of the course which they adopt as to the leading mechanical inventions, upon which experience has shown that the public safety chiefly depends. Now, I, for one, would never consent, for one moment, to stereotype by legislation, continuous brakes, or any part of the railway apparatus. It seems to me that that would be a most fatal course to take. No one will, I imagine, deny that the continuous brake of to-day, of which we may all be proud and may think the most perfect and scientific concern, may, and probably will, become antiquated in the year 1890, so that for Parliament to stereotype these inventions would be to strike a most terrible blow at the advancement of the country. But I would go even further than this, and I say it would be very rash for us, unless absolutely driven to it by the inaction of those responsible for the Companies, by the requirements of the public safety to lay down, by legislation, the conditions which the railroads should adopt with regard to what I may term this any other article of their apparatus. I believe that if Parliament was to enact that certain conditions were necessary with regard to their brakes, we should run a very great danger of shaking the whole responsibility of the railway directors. Our policy, as a Government, is certainly not that of substituting a central control for that of the individual or the locality: its aim is not to diminish, but rather to increase, the responsibility of all who manage the industrial concerns of the country. Besides this, if we once lay down a Government minimum as to any requirements of this kind, we know as well possible, by experience, that the Government minimum, in a very short time becomes the maximum which is adopted by all those who are concerned in the matter; so that, if we were to say that all were to have a brake which would draw up within 500 yards, you would find that the Railway Companies would never think of getting a brake which would draw up within 100 yards; whereas with the progress of invention, this will pretty surely be attained, as we may be confident that if we do not stereotype the public opinion of the day the Companies will be compelled, under the present system of publicity, to aim at the highest possible perfection in these matters. Further, if you adopt the policy of laying down by legislation the conditions which the Companies must adopt as to brakes or any other such matter, I see, with alarm, looming in the distance a whole army of new Government Inspectors. If you say, by Act of Parliament, that such and such conditions must be fulfilled by the Companies, you must have somebody to look out and see that the Railway Companies do fulfil the conditions; and, therefore, I say, I am looming before me an increasing army of Government Inspectors, with all the Continental system of minute Government interference and of State responsibility which I should be very sorry to face, in any way to encourage. Let us be in mind that we have only to turn to the debates which have taken place on this subject in either House of Parliament, to assure ourselves that both sides in politics seem to be equally anxious to avoid unnecessary interference with railways. But, on the other hand, having said that much against State interference, I must beg the special attention of the House to one fact to which we must not shut our eyes, and that is this—that when the Board of Trade inquired carefully into this matter in 1877, they found that, on considering a term of years, three-fourths of the accidents might, according to the opinion of their skilled Inspectors, have been avoided if continuous brakes had been used. This is a thing which we cannot get over; it is a great fact, and one deserving most careful consideration. We surely, then, are bound to take steps to see that these evils are dealt with. What, then, are the steps upon which the Government at present rely? The means may appear to be small; but after what I said at the beginning as to the success of such measures, it is not small. I allude to the Act of Parliament which was passed last year, which obliges the Railway Companies to send a half-yearly Return as to continuous brakes, the carriages and engines fitted with them, and as to all the details connected with this subject as affecting their rolling stock. This may seem, perhaps, a small matter; but I need only refer to the interlocking of signals and points, and the block system, and remind hon. Gentlemen of what was the effect of that very same treatment as regards these important matters. I allude, of course, to the Act which obliged the Railway Companies to send annual Returns to the Board of Trade with regard to interlocking and the block system, for the purpose of their being laid before Parliament. I need only give two or three figures. With regard to the interlocking of points and signals, in 1873, 10 of the principal Companies, with a mileage of 8,000 miles, had from 27 to 40 per cent of their points interlocked. The Bill is passed, and what do we find at the end of 1878? The same Companies at the end of 1878, with 9,000 and odd miles, have from 44 to 56 per cent of their points interlocked. The fact is very remarkable and very satisfactory. In the same way with regard to the block system; while, in 1873, the same 10 Companies worked on the absolute block system from 16 to 77 per cent, at the end of 1878 they worked from 67 to 94 per cent, showing again a very remarkable result from the system of presenting Returns to Parliament. I cannot, therefore, but suppose that all will agree that we have good cause, from experience of the past, to look with confidence to the result of the Act of last year with respect to Returns of continuous brakes: and that the House will feel that I am not wrong when I say that the means which we have adopted to meet these deficiencies, which we lament and acknowledge, are not trifling or likely to be ineffectual. But, be that as it may, as far as I am concerned, owing to the great evils which I see in further Government interference, I must decline to take any further step at the present moment, until I see more of the operation of the Act of last year. It must not be forgotten that it has only been in operation for one year, and the Railway Companies may fairly say—"What you are bidding us to do is a very difficult and expensive undertaking. We confess we have taken a good deal of time about it, but then we did not think you were in earnest in the matter; we have each our peculiar difficulties connected with it, and we dallied, perhaps, with the subject somewhat; but now we see you and the public mean that the thing should be done, we have for some time past put our heads together for the purpose of consulting on improvements, and, therefore, we trust we shall be permitted without interference to carry on our undertaking, provided that we do so within a reasonable time." I would venture to remind my noble Friend the Member for Flintshire (Lord Richard Grosvenor), that it is not a mere question of fashion, as he suggested, with regard to continuous brakes or interlocking, or any such matters connected with our safety on railways. The fact of the public taking up this matter or that arises from a much more serious reason. They watch the Reports of the Railway Inspectors who have gone into the causes of accidents. They observe that the lack of interlocking, or the lack of the block system, or of continuous brakes, has led to great loss of life; and they naturally feel that pressure must be put upon the Companies to adopt those improvements on their railways, which skilled Inspectors have said would save lives and have prevented terrible accidents. It is not that the fashion has passed, allow me to observe, with regard to the block system and interlocking, that makes it no longer necessary to make any fuss about them. The reason is a very simple one: the Act which necessitated Returns as to these matters being laid annually before Parliament has been successful; the victory of the public has been won, and this necessary apparatus has generally been adopted. A new issue has now arisen with reference to this serious matter of continuous brakes, owing to the same reason which led to the feeling as to interlocking, &c. I am willing to give every credit to the directors of Companies for their desire to do all they can; but I own that what has passed amongst them to-night would make me feel some little difficulty as to expecting agreement among them, unless subjected to some little pressure. Anyhow, the matter is far too serious to allow either Parliament or Government to wait indefinitely while the "battle of the brakes," as my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton (Mr. Hick) called it, is being fought out. Other countries are coming to a decision. The evidence on that point is very clear. Germany, France, and other countries, are rapidly settling what continuous brakes they will adopt; and there is no reason why the high sentiment and public spirit of our English directors should not also come to a decision, and soon put us in the forefront of all others. I trust, then, that they will take a wise and sensible view of the position; and I shall conclude by expressing the confident hope of soon being able to congratulate them upon the battle of the brakes being over, upon peace being established, and the public security largely enhanced.

Mr. Hick

Viscount Sandon

MR. BENTINCK said, he could not endorse the view taken by the noble Lord, who appeared to be inclined to wait for accidents to happen, and then trust to a sense of shame to prevent their recurrence. That was but the policy of shutting the door after the horse was stolen. The noble Lord's objection to the Motion, on the ground that it would tie the companies down to one specified improvement, might be used as a plea against any kind of Parliamentary interference with the Railway Companies. The fact was too much overlooked that nine out of ten of the railway accidents which happened could be prevented by proper legislation. The real cause of the great number of accidents was the excessive speed at which railway trains were allowed to run. The immediate cause was, no doubt, irregularity; but the speed rendered regularity impossible. Some years ago, the risk as between trains running at 60 miles and those running at 30 miles an hour was calculated, and it was found that where the speed of 60 miles an hour was resorted to, it became 100 to 1 that the passenger instead of arriving at his destination a little later with sound limbs would have terminated his journey on a shutter, as against the chances of accidents, at the speed of 30 miles an hour. It was said the travelling public would object to a diminution of the speed; but it was the duty of Parliament to interfere for the protection of lunatics, and the man who would risk his life in a rapid train was little better than a lunatic. He, therefore, hoped the Government would at once undertake the responsibility of initiating legislation to prevent the further sacrifice of human life.

ARMY—SOLDIERS IN UNIFORM.

OBSERVATIONS.

COLONEL MURE, who was precluded by the Rules of the House from Moving the following Amendment:—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to take such steps as may seem most fitting to secure to all persons wearing Her Majesty's uniform in the Army, Navy, Marines, or Auxiliary Forces, or other of Her Majesty's Services, all the rights, privileges, and immunity from special vexatious or exclusive regulations or practices as are enjoyed by Her Majesty's subjects not specially serving Her Majesty or enlisted in Her Majesty's sea or land forces, or wearing Her Majesty's uniform, in theatres, music, concert, or lecture halls, or other places of public resort under the control of the Lord Chamberlain, or licensed by magistrates, or under the control of any recognized authority, or in railways, trams, or steamboats, or other conveyances plying for hire, provided for the public use by companies or private persons under Acts of Parliament, or licensed by or under the control of magistrates of any other recognized authority;"

said, that in theory all persons were equal in this country, and those who had to manage the travelling arrangements of the country, or who conducted theatres, had no right to make any difference between any class of Her Majesty's subjects. Some years ago this question came before the House of Commons, not with regard to places of amusement or of travelling, but with respect to the liberty of soldiers to obtain seats in the Strangers' Gallery to hear the debates, like other persons. Two orders were given by two hon. Members, one to a soldier in the Royal Artillery, and the other to a soldier of the 17th Lancers; but when they presented themselves at the Gallery of the House of Commons they were refused admission, simply because they were attired in uniform. The matter was subsequently brought under the attention of the House. Lord Palmerston was Prime Minister at the time, and referred it to Lord Eversley, who was Speaker, and he said that although it was objectionable that soldiers wearing arms should be admitted, the objection did not apply to soldiers who did not wear arms. The consequence of that had been that soldiers had ever since been admitted to the Strangers' Gallery of the House of Commons when in uniform. In most foreign countries soldiers, instead of being subject to such insults and disabilities as they were in England, enjoyed particular privileges. They were allowed admission to the theatres at a lower rate than the general public, and they could travel in a superior class of carriage for a low rate. In this country, however, where it was most necessary to encourage good and respectable men to enter the Army, they found these curious disabilities existing. It might be said the reason was because, as at the time of the Duke of Wellington, the Army was recruited from the lowest class; but he was bound to say that reason no longer existed, and they ought to strive by every means in their power to put an end to the existing objectionable state of things. A few years ago, a corporal in the Coldstream Guards—a man of a somewhat superior character—married a young wife, who was also of a superior class. They were travelling together to the country, and the man desired to come over from Holyhead in the saloon of the steamer; but he was told that, while his wife could be allowed to do so, he could not be booked by the saloon, because he was attired in uniform. Another soldier had told him that on one occasion he formed one of a party of friends who applied for admission to the stalls of a theatre, and he was refused because he was in uniform, and he left the theatre in such a feeling that he was sorry he had ever entered the Army. The curious thing was, that if that soldier had put on plain clothes, he might have gained admission to any part of the theatre for which he could afford to pay; but, immediately he presented himself in Her Majesty's uniform, he was denied admission. Similar instances might be quoted in reference to seamen serving in the Royal Navy. Surely, something should be done in order to prevent a recurrence in places of public resort of such cases as he had referred to. If soldiers and sailors possessed the means to bring their grievances before the Law Courts, they would, he believed, obtain redress; but, unfortunately, they were not sufficiently well off to resort to the legal tribunals. Perhaps the most painful part of the case which he was laying before the House was the fact that instances had occurred in which insult had been offered to the wearers of Her Majesty's uniform when in church. It would be difficult to find any place of regular public resort which was not in the Metropolis under the Lord Chamberlain, and in the Provinces under some local authority. It seemed to him that such outrages as were complained of might be prevented by the interference of the Lord Chamberlain and the local authorities. It was a shameful thing that men who, when leaving for foreign service, had been cheered to the echo by the public—men who, when abroad, fought with the utmost gallantry and devotion, behaving like heroes at Rorke's Drift and Isandlana—should, on their return home, be liable to receive insult and contumely. He could only compare that with the treatment by a man of the world of his mistress, whom in private he professed unbounded admiration and regard for, but whom he "cut" if he met her while he was in the company of his family. He hoped that his right hon. and gallant Friend the Secretary of State for War would give him a more satisfactory answer than that which had been so often made—namely, that the matter should be left to the good sense of the public. He wished strongly to impress on the Secretary of State for War the importance of taking some steps in the matter, either by framing bye-laws for places of amusement, or by providing in the licences granted for places of public resort, for the proper treatment of soldiers in uniform.

Viscount Sandon

COLONEL STANLEY said, that as far as his personal feelings were concerned

he entirely sympathized with the object which his hon. and gallant Friend had in view. He was equally with him distressed at the instances he had brought forward, though he was not in a position to judge of the truth of the last analogy which the hon. and gallant Member drew as to the regard in which the soldier was held. This matter had been brought before the House on several occasions; but, with a right appreciation of its own powers, the House did not undertake more work than it could fulfil; and he could not at that moment see that any advantage could be derived, even if the Forms of Parliament permitted it, from an Address to Her Majesty, praying Her to take certain steps with regard to a question in which private interests and private arrangements were so largely concerned. The wearing of a red coat ought, no doubt, to be considered an honourable badge of service, and the man who wore it ought not to be precluded from anything that his position and means in civil life, were he a civilian, would entitle him to. He could not entirely endorse the opinion of his hon. and gallant Friend that the Government had the power either to interfere with the bye-laws of railways or the conditions on which licences were granted; but the matter was one which deserved consideration, and they were indebted to the hon. and gallant Member for pressing it again on the attention of the House and the Government. It was a fact within his own knowledge that non-commissioned officers had been precluded from entering into various places of amusement when wearing uniform, and it had struck him with surprise that those who were interested in the subject had not combined to see whether in point of law the managers of public entertainments had the power to enforce such regulations. Such a course would do far more to settle the question than any Parliamentary action. It would not be wise for Parliament to attempt to exercise its powers unless they were satisfied that it could be fully carried out. He would warn the managers of public entertainments and other persons concerned, that the time might come when the public would not be satisfied with the existing state of affairs, and when they would insist on some such steps being taken as those indicated by his hon. and gallant Friend. He trusted that his hon. and gallant Friend would accept his assurance of sympathy in the object he had in view, and rest content for the present with the public attention that had been directed to it.

Colonel Stanley

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOTT observed, that his hon. and gallant Friend had done good service in bringing this subject under the consideration of the House, and he was well pleased at the answer that had been returned by his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War. The Army was composed of a better class of persons than was formerly the case, and he contended that the Queen's uniform, so far from disgracing them, was an honour to them. He believed that it would be seen and allowed that these men ought to be admitted wherever other persons of the same position were allowed to go, so long as they conducted themselves properly.

NAVY—CASE OF MR. JOHN CLARE.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. BIGGAR, in rising to call attention to the claims of Mr. John Clare said, these claims were for various improvements alleged to have been introduced into iron ship-building, and adopted in the construction of Her Majesty's ships without due acknowledgment. As he could not move for a Committee on the present occasion, he should bring the case forward again and again until he succeeded in getting an independent inquiry into the justice of Mr. John Clare's claims.

MR. A. F. EGERTON said, that some years ago, when Mr. Clare sent in a statement of his claims to the Admiralty, the latter considered them on their merits and decided against them. Mr. Clare then brought an action before the Lord Chief Justice and a special jury, and claimed a large sum as compensation for inventions. His claims were disallowed, and he then made application for a new trial, which was unanimously refused. He afterwards petitioned the Queen, and that Petition was referred to the Admiralty, who subsequently referred it to the Home Office, stating that the matter had been already tried before the Lord Chief Justice, and that if Mr. Clare had claims which had not been decided upon, the Courts were open to him. A Motion for an inquiry into his grievance had been made in the House, and negatived. In 1874 he sent in a Memorial, which was referred to the Law Officers of the Crown, who reported that he had no claim whatever. He (Mr. A. F. Egerton) believed Mr. Clare to be a very clever man; but, in the face of all these adverse decisions, he would be pardoned from entering into the details. He had great sympathy with Mr. Clare as a public inventor; but he had no case, and he was afraid the Admiralty could do nothing for him.

MR. PARNELL said, there was a good deal more in the case of Mr. Clare than the majority of the House supposed. Mr. Clare's invention was the first thing that rendered possible the building of our enormous iron-clads, and he (Mr. Parnell) regretted the position taken up by the Admiralty on the question. It would have been much more satisfactory if the merits of the case had been gone into by the Secretary to the Admiralty, for it would then have appeared how untenable was the position which the Admiralty had taken.

IRELAND—CARRICK-ON-SUIR BRIDGE.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. O'DONNELL, in calling attention to the proposed blocking of the river trade of Carrick-on-Suir by the erection of a bridge below the town unprovided with a portcullis in place of the present bridge above the town, explained that the bridge which was about to be erected would have the effect of preventing ships discharging their cargoes at the town quays, which they could do at the present time. Such a proceeding was wanton and vexatious. The Grand Juries concerned had directed the works to which he objected quite oblivious to the interests of the town. It would be the same thing to build a bridge near the outlet of the Thames which would prevent shipping passing up to the City. It was impossible to get the authorities to review what they had done, for, like the famous Justices in the rhyme—"What they says they always says." They were told the Lord Lieutenant could give a remedy for the grievance; but it was entirely within his Excellency's discretion to re-consider these complicated plans, and he hoped the House would prevent the carrying out of the works which would condemn Carrick-on-Suir to hopeless failure.

MR. MELDON thought the subject had been most properly brought forward. It was a decided grievance. The matter was one in which the Lord Lieutenant had ample jurisdiction to pronounce a decision, and suggested that, before any further steps were taken, the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown with respect to it should be taken. He trusted that the Chief Secretary would take care that the matter was looked into, even if he could not give an assurance that the wishes of the inhabitants of Carrick-on-Suir would be yielded to, and that the bridge would not be built in the wanton manner proposed.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, the question had been referred to the Irish Law Officers, and in accordance with their opinion the Irish Government thought that they ought not to interfere with the decision of the judicial tribunal by whom the question of the new position of the bridge was considered. All persons interested had access to that tribunal, and its decision met with the approval of the great mass of the people concerned, although, no doubt, there were some who took a different view. He could not see from the papers that there was any reason to regret the course which was adopted in the matter by the Irish Government.

MAJOR NOLAN thought the Government were responsible, because they had made no practical efforts to reform the Grand Jury Laws, which would enable the people to prevent such things being done.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, it seemed a most monstrous and preposterous thing that a Grand Jury—an irresponsible body, representing nobody—should have the power of interfering with the traffic and checking the development of a place that might otherwise come to be a seaport town.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, these were the instances which illustrated the deficiencies of local government in Ireland, and which should guide them in framing a system of local government more in accordance with the interests and feelings of the country. The great complaint against the Grand Jury system was that it continually perpetrated such jobs, and he called this a job without hesitation, because they could not be called to account by those who found the money. It would, from a sentimental point of view, be a thing which they should all deplore if the people were to blow up the middle arch of the obnoxious bridge pending the return of a lucid interval to Her Majesty's Government when they should have sense enough to deal with this question. He appealed to the Government to give the terms of the legal decision which had been referred to.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON) expressed his surprise at the tone of the debate, and spoke of the bridge as an improvement by substituting a new bridge for an old one. The whole matter had been fully considered, and there was now no power on the part of the Grand Jury or the Lord Lieutenant to re-open the question. On the merits of the question there was no reason why it should be re-opened. The usual traffic of Carrick-on-Suir was by means of barges, and a sea-going ship would be quite a novelty there.

Motion, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," by leave, withdrawn.

Committee deferred till Monday next.

CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE BILL—[BILL 150.]

(Mr. Raikes, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 9th June.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. PARNELL thought it was very unreasonable for the Government to proceed with this Bill at that time of the evening. He submitted that it was not fair to ask hon. Members, and especially in view of the events of that evening, the Irish Members, to stop up until that time of night to enable the Government to inflict taxation on the people of a country, of whose interests they had shown themselves so entirely unmindful that evening. He did not consider he would be justified in remaining up any longer to pass this Bill, when the conduct of the Government in relation to Ireland had been scandalous in the extreme. The Government were not entitled to the assistance of Irish Members, when they had that night added another to the long list of instances of obstruction offered by the Government to Irish Business. He moved to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Parnell.)

Mr. O'Connor Power

The Committee divided:—Ayes 5; Noes 94: Majority 89.—(Div. List. No. 118.)

Clauses 15 to 22, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 23 (Provisions for the collection of income tax for the year 1880-81).

MR. LEIGHTON said, this Bill was intended to impose a tax on inhabited houses, but in reality it taxed uninhabited houses. He did not object to that, so long as all houses, whether inhabited or not, were subject to it. But last year, through the powerful influence of the Chambers of Commerce, all places of business where no one resided, except a care-taker, were freed from the tax, even although they were houses in which extremely large and profitable businesses were carried on. He proposed to place Mechanics' Institutions on the same footing. They were non-residential, except that a care-taker lived, sometimes, on the premises; the only difference between them that he could see was that whilst the houses of business belonged to the masters, these places were maintained by the men. The factory was a place for work, the Institute for culture and education. It was difficult to draw a distinction in principle between them, and most unwise to admit class exemptions, without applying the principle equally. His Amendment was not a claim for exemption from taxation, but a claim for equality in taxation. He hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not meet him with any dilatory plea about the unwisdom of limiting the area of taxation. If that were a true argument, they ought to repeal the Act of last year, which first put into this annual Bill the exemption of houses of business.

Amendment proposed,

In page 9, at the end of the Clause, to add the words "Every house which is occupied as a Mechanics' Institute shall be exempted from Duties by the said Commissioners, upon proof of the fact to their satisfaction, and this exemption shall take effect although a servant or other person may dwell in such house for the protection thereof."—(Mr. Leighton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was sorry that he could not accept the proposed Amendment. The fact was that this house tax might be frittered away by continual exemptions following on exemptions. No sooner was a concession made than, instead of satisfaction being given, a new claim was immediately introduced. First of all, the tax was taken off houses occupied merely for business purposes, then it was removed from houses used merely for professional purposes, and then followed other exemptions. Every man said, "My case is as strong as my neighbour's," with the result that if that went on much longer they would have no tax at all. He could see no reason why Mechanics' Institutions should be exempted. They were, no doubt, most valuable institutions; but there was no clause exempting them which would not exempt also clubs, lecture-rooms, and all sorts of buildings of a similar character, until they got to clubs employed for social purposes, and rooms also used for artistic and social purposes. He was sorry he could not consent to this Amendment; but, to his mind, its object was to carry still further a system of exemption, which had already proceeded far too rapidly, and which they ought to try and check rather than extend.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN understood that this exemption already applied to warehouses where a servant slept all night, or, at least, that they were only charged at the value of a house, such as a person of that position might be supposed to sleep in, and not on the rateable value of the whole premises. The grievance complained of here was, that a working man in charge of one of these Mechanics' Institutions, who, under ordinary circumstances, would live in a house of the value, say, of £10, submitted the institution, by the mere fact of his living there, to a charge on the rateable value of the whole place, which was, perhaps, £200 or £300. Why this should be so he could not understand. They were not asking for a new exemption, or that the principle of exemption should be carried any further. They merely asked that a principle already adopted and acted upon in one case should be applied to another exactly similar, and very deserving of the attention of the Committee.

MR. COURTNEY thought the case might be carried even further, though he spoke with some diffidence on the subject, because he was very imperfectly informed on the matter. If he understood the law aright, a house occupied for purposes of science and art was exempt from house duty, provided it was exclusively so occupied. A case of that kind was, he remembered, tried some time ago. The Philosophic Society of Cambridge had been exempt under that rule for a very long time; but the duty was subsequently charged on the ground that the Society did not come within the scope of the exemption, because one of the rooms was used as a reading room. He understood that places used for Mechanics' Institutions were exempt, if no one lived on the premises. Further, if a person lived on business premises simply as a care-taker, he understood that the premises were exempt from duty, except as to a small amount. If that was the case in regard to business premises, he could not see why the same exemption should not be extended to Mechanics' Institutions. It was not a question of the extension of an exemption, it was merely the application of a principle already adopted. For his part, he thought it was rather to the interest of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to encourage proposals which would place assessments on a definite, intelligible footing; because he might, by-and-bye, find this tax a strong weapon in his hands, as the tax was a much less objectionable one than the Income Tax. He wished to know if the law had been rightly interpreted; for if it had, he thought a very strong case had been made out.

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID thought some further answer was required from the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He could quite understand that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was unwilling to give up any portion of his Revenue when he had a falling Revenue to deal with; but the demand now made was so modest, and so exactly on a principle laid down by the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself, that to reply, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer had done, that he was unwilling to give up the tax, was hardly sufficient. He believed these Mechanics' Institutes did much for the Revenue in another way, for they promoted in a man that feeling of respect for himself, of sobriety and uprightness, which, of course, it was the desire of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as far as possible, to promote. That being so, the very small amount given up by this proposed remission was hardly worth considering. It had been established that when a person lived in an otherwise uninhabited house of business merely for the purpose of taking care of it, he was not compelled to pay the full amount of the duty on the value of the house. That being so, some other answer, besides the fact that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was unwilling to give up this tax, was necessary to explain why a difference was made between houses of business and Mechanics' Institutions.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he did not precisely know what the point was to which the hon. Baronet alluded; but there seemed to him to be a considerable difference between the case dealt with last year and that now before them. The object then was to do justice as between different classes of traders. One class lived in the house in which they carried on their business; while others lived in the suburbs, and left their business houses to care-takers. The alteration was made, therefore, to put the two cases on an equality. But in the case of Mechanics' Institutions, and other buildings more or less cognate, that argument did not apply. Of course, they might say that a certain class of building ought to be exempt; but then that could be carried on from Mechanics' Institutions to all the Clubs of London, and any other institutions which were in any way analogous or cognate. It would be a great pity to fritter away taxes in that way. To grant this exemption now would only pave the way for further deductions in the future, a thing which the House ought by no means to encourage. He saw no reason for making this special concession, and, therefore, could not concede it.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN begged to point out that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not yet answered the Question as to what was now the state of the law with regard to Scientific Institutions. He should also like to know what was the case with schools? A care-taker resided in a great many schools; but he did not think in those cases that the tax was levied on the full rateable value.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD) said, the principle on which the tax was based was very plain. The tax was on inhabited houses, and the various exceptions were recited in the Preamble. First, premises occupied solely for the purposes of trade were exempt. Then came the further exemption of houses used and occupied in the greater part for the purposes of trade, but occupied also by a care-taker. Then came a further exemption of houses occupied for certain professions; and now it was sought to extend the exemption further than it had ever been carried before, and to include houses which were neither occupied for trades nor for professions. Until these Mechanics' Institutions were brought within the present law, the tax must apply. Of course, if no one lived there, they were exempt, and did not come within the purview of the tax.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN asked the state of the law with regard to schools and museums?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (SIR HARDINGE GIFFORD) said, they were exempt, because they were not inhabited houses.

MR. E. J. REED asked if a Philosophical Society was subject to the tax where a care-taker resided on the premises? Because, if it was, then the distinction between it and the Mechanics' Institutions seemed too fine a one to be drawn. In many instances that he knew of, a Mechanics' Institute was a purely Scientific or Philosophical Society. A peculiar claim might also be made on behalf of these institutions, as they were mainly supported by the working classes.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER thought this was hardly a point to be urged; for the houses in which the labouring classes lived were below the level of the tax, and the labouring classes were also exempt from Income Tax. If Mechanics' Institutions were exempt, he did not see how they could fail from applying the principle to all other places cognate in character, though they might be in the hands of much wealthier persons.

MR. E. J. REED denied that there was any connection between these places and clubs. They were entirely different in character, and it would be quite impossible to include the one with the other.

MR. GILES said, he agreed with the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Certainly, if Mechanics' Institutions were to be exempt, there could be no reason for refusing exemption to many other similar institutions.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER thought the request made by the Mover of the Motion a very reasonable one, and he presumed it would not have been made if it had not represented a practical inconvenience. He presumed the hon. Member knew what the state of the law was as to these Philosophical Societies, and he wished that he would tell them his view of it.

MR. LEIGHTON said, that the ground on which the alteration in favour of houses of business was made last year was that these houses were not really occupied as places of residence. It seemed to him that the Mechanics' Institutes were on exactly the same footing.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 30; Noes 55: Majority 25.—(Div. List, No. 119.)

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he proposed to withdraw the clause, as it had been represented to him, since its introduction, that it would be exceedingly inconvenient, and would materially interfere with a great many persons. He would afterwards propose an Amendment enabling the Inland Revenue to appoint.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 24 (Appointment of collectors for income tax under Schedules (A.) and (B.) and land tax and inhabited house duties).

MR. STANTON asked for some explanation of Sub-section 3. It seemed rather strange to say that if in any year an office was not filled up the appointment should lapse. Would it not be much better to put it in the hands of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue once for all?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, replied, that complaints were constantly made by persons forced to serve of the hardship imposed on them, and therefore the Bill allowed the Inland Commissioners, on persons refusing to serve, to appoint collectors. At present, the collectors were appointed by the localities, and they got a percentage for collection of the duty. The Government proposed to appoint their own officers to do the work; but it would, of course, be manifestly unfair to dispossess persons who had given up their incomes to take this work. Therefore, the power of appointment would still remain in the localities; and only when they had refused to exercise it, would it revert to the Department. But when it had once done so, the localities would never again have the power of appointment; because, otherwise, Government might go to the expense of appointing a staff of officers one year, and find itself saddled with them and their pensions the next.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY said, it simply came to this—that the collectors would be appointed as before; and only in the event of their refusal to serve, or not caring about the work, would the Commissioners undertake the work.

MR. WHITWELL knew the task of collection to be very repulsive to many individuals who were appointed. He wished to know whether the appointments would still be compulsory?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON replied, that the localities would exercise their powers just as before, but the collectors might refuse to serve; and in the event of the office not being filled up before the date mentioned, the Government would undertake the work.

Clause agreed to.

PART IV.

Excise.

Clause 25 (Police proceedings for penalties in relation to dogs).

MR. DODSON observed, that certain words at the end of the clause included the Small Penalties Act of 1865, although in that Act it was declared that its provisions should not apply to any penalties imposed by any Act relating to the Inland Revenue. Therefore, they were incorporating an Act which did not apply. Had they not better leave those words out, especially, as to make the complications more complete, they were about to pass a measure (The Summary Jurisdiction Bill) which repealed the Small Penalties Act?

SIR DAVID WEDDERBURN said, by the Act of 1878, dogs kept by farmers and shepherds for tending sheep and cattle were exempted from the tax; but that exemption did not apply to dogs kept for the same purpose by graziers, dairymen, and butchers. He would ask whether the same rule ought not to apply? He agreed with the Chancellor of the Exchequer about the unwisdom of extending exemptions; but in this case the exemption was of dogs kept for leading sheep and cattle, not of dogs kept by farmers and shepherds.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER replied, that this case very fairly illustrated the mischief arising from exemptions. He could only say that this matter was fully discussed, and the words in the Act represented the decision of the House; while, if they were to go on making and extending exemptions, he did not know where they would stop. No doubt, there were many persons who kept dogs simply for their usefulness; but it had been thought wise to make the exemption stop where it did.

MR. WHITWELL pointed out that the police prosecuted in cases where licences had not been taken out, acting under the direction of the Inland Revenue Office; but if they failed to secure a conviction, then the cost fell upon the Police Fund. He thought this was unfair, and ought to be altered.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY said, but for this system there would be no check on prosecutions. It worked very well, for he had had many cases before him, and the police never failed to secure a conviction.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD), in answer to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Chester (Mr. Dodson) explained that these words were put in to settle a doubt as to the present law. It was doubtful whether the prosecutions should be under the Police Act or Jarvis's Act, and these words were inserted for the purpose of clearing up the matter.

MR. DODSON remarked, that the clause gave the Justices power to act under the Small Penalties Act, although in the 7th clause of the Act it was enacted that it should not apply to any Revenue case. Therefore, in order to make the matter clear, and to avoid ambiguity, they ought to add the words "notwithstanding anything contained in the seventh clause of the Act."

Clause agreed to.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON moved, in page 10, after Clause 24, to insert the following Clause:—

(Parishes formed for Poor Law purposes may be made parishes for the purposes of certain taxes.)

"Where in England under the authority of Parliament any part of a parish or place has been formed into a new parish or place for the purposes of Poor Law administration, or any parish or place, or part of a parish or place, has been amalgamated with or included within the boundaries of another parish or place for the said purposes, the Commissioners of Inland Revenue may, if in their discretion they think fit, by order in writing, direct that such new parish or place, or such parish or place with which, or within the boundaries of which any parish or place, or part of a parish or place has been amalgamated or included, shall be a parish or place for which a separate assessment of the Inhabited House Duties and of the Duties of Income Tax shall be made, and for which assessors and collectors may be appointed for the purpose of assessing and collecting the said Duties.

"In case any parish or place or part of a parish or place in the jurisdiction of one body of Commissioners of Income Tax is amalgamated with or included within the boundaries of a parish or place in the jurisdiction of another body of Commissioners of Income Tax, such order shall have the effect of transferring the jurisdiction to such last-mentioned body."

The hon. Gentleman said, the object of the clause was to enable the Inland Revenue, as far as possible, to make the areas of Imperial and local taxation co-extensive. Some time ago the Local Government Board acquired statutory powers to adjust boundaries, and it was desirable that the Inland Revenue Department should have power to make similar charges. A case in point had recently occurred in the neighbourhood of Hull, where some common land belonging to various parties had been built on and made into a populous district. The Local Government Board had made that into a separate parish; and, of course, it was necessary that the Inland Revenue Board should have power to make their areas correspond.

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD moved, in page 10, after Clause 24, to insert the following Clause:—

(Particulars of demand note.)

"The collectors of House Duty and Income Tax under Schedules (A) and (B) shall in the demand note delivered previous to payment, and in the receipt given subsequently to payment of the Duty or Tax, distinctly describe the property and specify the amount of the assessment and the rate at which the Duty or Tax is charged upon such assessment."

The right hon. Gentleman said, that the proposal was so obviously just and fair, that he did not suppose his proposition would be resisted. On the demand note for taxes was merely at present given the name and amount, and the receipt received from South Africa, and he could say that the greatest dissatisfaction prevailed there at the conduct of some of the military authorities in reference to this matter. It was not always that the good disposition of the War Office was able to manifest itself in its subordinates, when they were at such a distance from London. Nothing but the word of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, sent out to the spot, would cause his wishes to be attended to. He trusted the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would be able to assure the Committee that he would send out instructions on the subject. By the accounts he (Mr. Sullivan) had received from trustworthy sources, he knew that the military authorities treated in a very off-hand manner, and with scant courtesy, any applications as to the spiritual wants of the Catholic soldiers, who were shedding their blood under their colours in South Africa.

Sir David Wedderburn

MR. O'DONNELL said, that under that Vote he wished to make a complaint and ask for information. He noticed an item for the payment of clergymen performing divine service for military prisoners. He was informed that at a very recent period, in the gaol at Taunton, there were between 50 and 60 Catholic military prisoners; but that there was no provision whatever for service for them. The military prisoners of the other religions had every opportunity for assisting in divine worship, and did, in fact, on Sunday, attend the ministrations of their clergyman. The Catholic prisoners were strictly locked up on Sundays; while their comrades were able to attend church. He knew this state of affairs existed until a short time ago, and he was not sure that it had been remedied. He trusted that it had. If the present was an inconvenient time at which to ask for information on the subject, he should be glad to postpone the question.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that hon. Gentlemen would very materially assist them in carrying out that which was their wish and the wish of the Committee, if they would forward to him any instances, properly authenticated, such as that cited by the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell). In cases of this description, he uniformly caused inquiry to be made. With regard to the present matter, he had to state that there was a standing rule that payments were made for officiating clergymen wherever there was a certain number of people of a particular religion to be provided for. There had been either some misrepresentation, or some fact had not been made known which prevented the usual rule applying in this instance. He should be glad if the hon. Gentleman would kindly forward him particulars of the case, and he would inquire into it. With regard to the Cape, what he wished to be understood was this—that he was not adverse to meet the spiritual wants of either the officers or men as far as possible; but that information had been given to him to the effect that there were already at the Cape a sufficient number of clergymen of the various persuasions who could perform the duties of military chaplains. Inasmuch as these clergymen were on the spot, he did not consider it for the advantage of the public or of the men themselves to send out others, so that there would be two people to do the work of one.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £29,400, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for the Administration of Military Law, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880."

MAJOR O'BEIRNE moved the reduction of the Vote by £2,000, the pay of the Judge Advocate General. He pointed out that in the evidence given before the Select Committee on the Army Discipline Bill it was stated by Mr. O'Dowd that the opinion of the Judge Advocate General had no legal effect whatever; that the Commander-in-Chief could set aside the opinion of the Judge Advocate General. If that were the case, he could not see the use of the appointment.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £2,000, for the Salary of the Judge Advocate General, be omitted from the proposed Vote."—(Major O'Beirne.)

COLONEL STANLEY said, the Committee would well understand that the right hon. and learned Gentleman was present and ready to answer all matters connected with his Department; but they would easily see why the duty of explaining the Vote and of showing its Committee—Report—Convention (Ireland) Act Repeal (77); Costs Taxation (House of Commons) (99).*

Third Reading—Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (Waterford, &c.) (91); Public Health (Scotland) Provisional Order (Bothwell)* (92); West India Loans* (85), and passed.*

CHURCH OF ENGLAND—THE CHAPTER OF YORK CATHEDRAL—CASE OF THE
REV. JAMES FLEMING.

OBSERVATIONS. QUESTION.

LORD HAMPTON, in rising to call attention to the painful position of the Reverend James Fleming, as a canon residentiary of York Cathedral, in being deprived of the rights and privileges of a member of the chapter; and to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the difficulties which have arisen with respect to Canon Fleming's position will be referred for consideration by the proposed Royal Commission, said, that Canon Fleming now found himself in a very painful, as well as unprecedented position; and in order to avoid the consequences of that position, he was contemplating a resignation of the office which he had received from the Crown. The public generally were aware of the fact that in cathedrals of the old foundation the office of canon residentiary was composed of two parts—the one the canonry, and the other the prebendary, the latter of which gave to the canon residentiary his rights to a seat in the chapter. York Cathedral was one of the old foundations; but it had been the invariable custom, when a canon residentiary fell vacant, for one person to be appointed to both the canonry and the prebendary. By ancient custom rather than by law, when a clergyman was promoted to a Bishopric, the appointment to fill up the vacancy caused by the promotion fell to the Crown. The Crown appointed the Rev. James Fleming to the canonry, but the most rev. Primate (the Archbishop of York) intervened, and appointed the hon. and rev. Mr. Forester to the prebendal stall which had been vacated by the promotion to the Bishopric. He (Lord Hampton) believed he might say, without fear of contradiction, that the course taken by the most rev. Primate, whatever might have been his motives, or his views of the question, was entirely without precedent—that there had been no case in which, upon the filling of the residentiaryship of York, there had been any separation between the prebend and the residentiaryship, which together made up the position of canon residentiary of York. He thought there could be but one feeling—that this was a state of things inconsistent with the high ecclesiastical rank of the Cathedral Church of York. He could not but believe there must be some misapprehension with regard to this case. The most rev. Primate could not have contemplated that Canon Fleming would be deprived of the rights and privileges of a member of the chapter; but Mr. Fleming had not been able to exercise the right to preach in his turn in the cathedral, and it was doubtful even whether his vote in the chapter had been recorded. He thought their Lordships would agree that this state of things in the cathedral ought not to exist. The question, then was, what was the remedy for such a state of affairs? He had been informed on high authority that the proper thing to do was to apply to the Court of Queen's Bench to issue a mandamus to the dean and chapter of York; but he would venture to suggest a remedy free from any of the anxiety attending a mandamus, and which required no suit at law. His remedy was that there should be a conciliatory reconsideration of the case, and the most rev. Primate should appoint Canon Fleming to the next prebendal vacancy. He was supported in his view by a letter he had received from one of the deans of the old foundation. The letter stated—

“I hold that the Bishop or the Crown have a perfect right to nominate any spiritual person, although not a prebendary, to a vacant canon residentiaryship. It is of great importance to the Bishop and the Crown to contend for this privilege, for it widens the area of their choice. But this granted, I submit it is well for the Bishop to give a prebendal stall to such an incoming canon (whether appointed by the Crown or by himself) as soon as possible, and so reduce any conflict between 3 & 4 Vict. and the statutes of an old foundation cathedral as much as possible. It would be well to join a prebendal stall indissolubly with each canon residentiaryship, so that they might fall vacant together, and a new canon (whether appointed by the Bishop or the Crown) become at once a member of the prebendal body.”

In conclusion, he begged to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the difficulties which had arisen with respect to Canon Fleming's position would be referred for consideration by the proposed Royal Commission?

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD: There can be no doubt that this is, as my noble Friend (Lord Hampton) has said, a complicated case; but it is only complicated by matters being introduced into its consideration which really have nothing to do with the point which we have to decide. The case to which my noble Friend has called the attention of your Lordships cannot, as he has said, be fairly understood without some reference to a previous appointment to a canonry in the same chapter of York. When Dr. Basil Jones was appointed to the See of Llandaff, the prebendal stall and residentiary canonry, together with the chancellorship of the cathedral, which he had held, became vacant; and I asked the most rev. Primate the Archbishop of the Province (the Archbishop of York) as to the order in which the three appointments should be filled up. The answer which I received was that the prebend was to be filled first, then the chancellorship of the cathedral, and next the canonry. I then instructed the Secretary of State to take the necessary steps; but when it came for the most rev. Primate to perform his part of the duty, he reversed the order which he had recommended me to adopt, and nominated the hon. and rev. Mr. Forester to the canonry, before he issued his mandate for the appointment of the same hon. and rev. gentleman to a prebendal stall and to the chancellorship of the cathedral. Since then, the Chapter have demurred to the order in which the appointments were made, and not only questioned the propriety of what had been done, but absolutely declared that under no circumstances should any clergyman be appointed to a canonry who had not previously been a prebend of the cathedral. This course being one which, if correct, would have limited the power of the Crown as patron, which power it was my duty to defend, I caused a case to be submitted to the Law Officers of the Crown. They considered it, and they decided that the course taken by the Chapter was quite erroneous—that an Act had passed—the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 113—which had terminated the qualification for holding a canonry which the Chapter had insisted upon, they themselves being probably not aware of the existence of such an Act. But the matter had been decided, and as illustrative of the law which they laid down, the Law Officers referred to a then recent case, the "Queen v. the Dean of Hereford." All this was communicated to the Chapter, and no further difficulties occurred. Canon Forester was appointed, and enjoyed his rights and privileges as a canon. A remarkable circumstance is that a considerable time afterwards—some months subsequently—I received a letter from the most rev. Primate the Archbishop of the Province, informing me that he had, in the first instance, from want of knowledge, given me inaccurate advice as to the order of the appointments; and that he was advised that by the law, as it now stood, the appointment of every prebend not in receipt of emolument was reserved to the Archbishop. That was rather a startling announcement, and as the only object which the Government could have was to ascertain the truth and to defend the just Prerogative of the Crown, I thought the best course to adopt was again to submit the new point to the Law Officers. They considered it, and they decided that the Archbishop was quite right in his interpretation of the law. It appears that after the Act which I have already quoted was placed upon the Statute Book—either in the following year, or two years afterwards, in the reign of her present Majesty—an Act was passed which reserved, as the Archbishop stated, all the prebendaries not connected with emolument to the Archbishop. There was no controversy at the time to which I am now referring, the question as to Canon Forester having been settled; but, shortly after this, another vacancy occurred by Her Majesty nominating Dr. Thorold to the See of Rochester. He was canon residentiary of the Chapter of York. At that time, the most rev. Primate wrote to me announcing that he should exercise his privilege, which was not contested; and after the Law Officers had given their decision, I felt it my duty to write to him, acknowledging that the position which he had adopted was recognized by the Government, and that, in future, I certainly should not contest the appointments. By the appointment of Dr. Thorold, a canon residentiaryship became vacant. The Archbishop wrote to me to say that, in accordance with his previous announcement, with the opinion of the Law Officers, and with my letter which had sanctioned the course, he should exercise his privilege and appoint a prebendary—leaving me, of course, to avail myself of the right of exercising, with the consent of Her Majesty, the Royal Prerogative of appointment to the canonry. Under these circumstances, I felt it my duty to recommend Her Majesty to appoint Dr. Fleming to the canonry, in recognition of his great ability, zeal, and high character, and in a full conviction that he would do further honour to the sacred Order, of which he was already a distinguished member. This being so, one would have thought that if the Chapter held the strong opinions which my noble Friend now attributes to them they would have called a meeting, and, after arriving at some strong opinion, would have communicated it to me; but they did nothing of the kind, and, as far as I know, the only thing done was a few individual protests until after the canon had been installed, and then the Chapter expressed their opinion that their views should be submitted to the Law Officers of the Crown. Your Lordships must be aware that it is not customary to allow strangers to submit their cases, as matter of course, to the Law Officers of the Crown. Generally, it is considered to be the privilege of Her Majesty's Ministers, when in doubt, to fall back upon those gentlemen; but I knew that corporations, and especially ecclesiastical corporations, are of a sensitive character, and, therefore, I determined to meet their views in every possible manner. I wrote to the Chapter of York, telling them that if they would have their case prepared by themselves it should be submitted to the Law Officers, and that I would authorize some gentleman, on their part, to see all the papers and to inspect the opinions when they were given. The Law Officers decided distinctly against the position which the Dean and Chapter of York had taken up. They decided according to what they considered to be the clear intention of the Act referred to by the most rev. Primate—not viewing it in any way as a question on which there could be any doubt. I think your Lordships will be rather astonished that the matter did not then rest; because, although it was not a formal arbitration, yet still one might have morally expected that the decision of the Law

Officers would have been accepted by the Chapter. But that was not the case. The opinion given by the Law Officers was entirely adverse to the claim of the Dean and Chapter, and instead of submitting to it, they passed at last this resolution—

“That the recent appointment of the Rev. James Fleming to the office of canon residentiary, he not having been previously appointed a member of the prebendary body, is, in the opinion of high legal authorities, consulted at different times by the Dean and Chapter of York, likely seriously to affect the constitution of the cathedral. The Dean and Chapter, therefore, deem it expedient that the points in debate should be referred to a Court of Law, so that a conclusive decision may be obtained on a matter of such importance.”

What were we to do under these circumstances? There was only one interpretation to put upon them. We were perfectly ready that the matter should be settled by a Court of Law, if the decision of such a Court was deemed necessary by the Dean and Chapter. I called upon the Solicitor to the Treasury to put himself into communication with the legal advisers of the Chapter, so as to see how the matter could be brought before the Queen's Bench. A long time elapsed, and much correspondence passed between the Solicitor to the Treasury and persons on behalf of the Chapter; and, after a long time, the Solicitor to the Treasury said that it was totally impossible to induce the Chapter of York to agree to any basis upon which a legal point could be raised and the decision of the High Court arrived at, and that it was quite clear to him that they had no wish to have the decision of a Court of Law. They were, in fact—

“Willing to wound, and yet afraid to strike.”

Your Lordships should observe that it was the Dean and Chapter who first started the idea of having the decision of a Court of Law. It was not Her Majesty's Government. I should mention that nothing could be so simple as to obtain a legal decision. The Dean and Chapter had only to refuse Canon Fleming a vote upon any occasion when a vote was taken in the Chapter, or to inhibit him from preaching, and the whole question could then have been submitted to the Court of Queen's Bench. The Dean and Chapter, however, would never make any movement of the kind; and as Her Majesty's Government were advised by the Law Officers of the Crown that the appointment of Mr. Fleming to the canonry was perfectly legal, they declined to take any further step. Certainly, when I heard from my noble Friend that the question which he has brought before your Lordships is a most painful question, and that there is a chance, in consequence of its having been raised, of Canon Fleming's resigning the important and well-deserved preferment which he has gained, I must say that nothing could give me more pain than if a man so distinguished were by any misunderstanding between the most rev. Primate the Archbishop of the Province and the Dean and Chapter to be deprived of a position which he is calculated eminently to adorn. I will ask your Lordships' permission to read a few questions which I have placed upon paper, and which will make the exact situation of affairs clear. Are the privileges of Canon Fleming denied? First, as to his vote. In a letter dated the 3rd of October, 1877, Mr. Fleming writes—

"I claimed my place in the chapter to-day and voted. The Dean allowed me to vote, for I asked him whether he acknowledged my vote, and he replied 'Certainly.'"

As to Mr. Fleming's stipend, he has always been paid a stipend. As to his residence, he has resided regularly. As to his preaching — and this is important, for he is one of the most eloquent preachers I have ever listened to — well, Mr. Fleming has preached, though there did appear an anonymous paragraph which said that he did so only by courtesy, but which was not traced to any authority. The Law Officers assert that Canon Fleming's admission has been complete and formal, and that no complaint can be made based upon the form of the oaths of admission. Under these circumstances, what is the conclusion that it seems must inevitably be drawn? It is that Mr. Fleming is as good a canon as any canon of any cathedral, and that he enjoys all his privileges. As to the conduct of the most rev. Primate the Archbishop of the Province, it is clear that, as far as his communication with the Government has gone, he has acted under legal advice. My Lords, I can only say, if Mr. Fleming is placed in a painful position, that I am here to defend him; and that if his rights and privileges are not admitted or, at least, are denied him by the Dean and Chapter, I am ready to advise that he shall have those rights and privileges asserted. Before I do so, however, his rights must be denied him. The Dean and Chapter have involved us in a most painful and lengthy correspondence—painful, only, because it is lengthy; but they have no case whatever. They are really setting up the memory of an ancient custom against the statute law of the Realm. No one can be more interested than myself in Mr. Fleming's possession of all his rights and privileges, as I am responsible for having advised the Crown to nominate that gentleman to his post. I believe he will be an honour to the position which he occupies; and if any member of the Chapter of York attacks his rights and privileges—if they prevent him from voting when there is a meeting of the Chapter, or if they prevent him from residing or preaching, or in any way impugn the undoubted and legal rights which he possesses as canon residentiary of York—I am the person who will be first ready to take up his cause.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK said, he only rose to say a few words, lest the noble Lord who had brought this subject before the House (Lord Hampton) should think his silence disrespectful. This was not a new controversy, for it had, in fact, been going on for 15 years. He would quote several instances which showed that that was the case. The first occurred in 1864, when the Dean and Chapter ignored the Act of Parliament altogether, and elected a canon by the old process, under which nobody was collated as a residentiary canon, but under which one went through the process of "protesting one's residence," and thus became a residentiary canon. The Act of Parliament provided that any priest who had been in Priest's Orders for six years could be collated a canon residentiary; but the Dean and Chapter preferred their own custom of only making prebendaries canons residentiary. He had taken legal advice in reference to this matter, and those whom he had consulted, in every case said that the statute, in its plain, obvious meaning, did away with the ancient custom. Dr. Jones was collated in July, 1873, but not installed, and the same course was adopted in the next case—namely, that of Dr. Thorold in February, 1874. In that which followed, Mr. Forester was admitted in December, 1874, and without being a prebendary he was installed—the first case of the kind on record. But there, it was known that if installation was refused, legal proceedings would be adopted; and then followed the case so fully explained by the noble Earl (the Earl of Beaconsfield). The question, which had just been so luminously dealt with, might be reduced to this—had a canon so appointed a right to vote in chapter, and whether any but residentiary canons had a right to vote? In the Act it was provided that a “canon” should be understood throughout as a “residentiary canon,” and it would be seen by the Act that he had full power to vote in the chapter. In the present case, the Dean and Chapter obtained a doubtful opinion from Sir Robert Phillimore on the whole case; but, in reply to the question—

“Would such residentiary become by virtue of his office a member of Chapter, not having ever been elected to a vacant prebend—in fact, has the Archbishop of York the power to increase the number of members of the chapter?”—He said—“I incline to the opinion that he would be a member of the Chapter.”

He (the Archbishop of York) had been applied to as to whether he would not present Mr. Fleming to the vacant prebend. Well, he did not see how his doing so would remove the difficulty. In 1877 Mr. Fleming voted, and he either voted in his right, or he did not. If he did not vote in his own right, he was an intruder; and his receiving, in 1879, a perfect appointment would not mend the matter. It was not a question whether he had the right of appointment, or the Crown, or the Dean and Chapter; the question was, whether the matter was to remain in a state of muddle? He had asked Mr. Fleming whether his vote was taken, and he said that there was so much confusion, so many people were talking at once, that he could not say whether his vote had or had not been taken. Then he asked the same question of the dean, and he replied that he had prepared a statement, which he would send him, and it was sent to him, and to many of their Lordships as well. It made out that he (the Archbishop of York) had done some very sad things, with very painful effects; but it did not say a word as to whether Mr. Fleming had voted. In their correspondence with the noble Earl at the head of the Government (the Earl of Beaconsfield), the Dean and Chapter used some expression of this kind—“We cannot admit we have done what we have not done”—that was, they could not admit that they had refused the vote. Well, according to that, Mr. Fleming had his vote; and, in one point, he had taken the matter in rather a wrong point of view. He was a man of great eminence, and the choice of the Crown might well fall upon him. Since Mr. Fleming had been in York, notwithstanding the somewhat cold and suspicious atmosphere of the place, no person had so rapidly gained the hearts and affections of the people as Mr. Fleming had. He was not aware that he had been forbidden to preach; but if that were so, he (the Archbishop of York) would undertake to find him enough preaching within the ambit of York to last him till that time next year. But Mr. Fleming had taken the matter in the painful point of view. After all, it was a principle of law. Why had he not appointed Mr. Fleming to the vacant prebendal stall? Because there was not the least necessity for it. He had now every possible privilege he could then have; and it was not desirable, after 15 years, that this dispute should be prolonged. Up to his appointment, he had not seen Mr. Fleming, though he had known him very well ever since. He could not appoint a clergyman he did not know. The Crown looked over a broader space; he was concerned only with his own diocese, and appointed Mr. Landon, who bore a distinguished name. The question, as he said, was one of dry law, and it was very undesirable that this scandal, for it had almost become a scandal, should go on festering among them. The course taken by the Crown appeared to him to be perfectly straightforward and reasonable. The Dean and Chapter had been offered every facility for raising the question, and they had refused to do so. It was for their Lordships to say whether the case was one for a new Act of Parliament. For his part, a new Act did not appear to be necessary. There was another case which was on all fours with the present, that of the Dean and Chapter of Chichester. The Dean and Chapter belonged to an old cathedral. The present Bishop took precisely the same course he (the Archbishop of York) adopted when, in 1870, a canonry and prebend became vacant. He wished to make two appointments, and give them to men of merit. A correspondent of The Times said about that case—

“As at York, there was no stall appropriated to a canon residentiary; but the Dean and Chapter made arrangements for a stall. As at York, there was no preaching turn for a canon residentiary; but Mr. B., like his brethren, supplied, in his turn, the place of an absenting prebendary. The difference between York under Dean Duncombe, and Chichester under Dean Hook, seems to be this. The Chapters of both cathedrals have been aware of their power of raising an obstruction; the Chapter of York showed their ability in making the most of it, the Chapter of Chichester in breaking it down.”

Well, what occurred at Chichester was either a great violation of the Act of Parliament, or it interpreted the law quite sufficiently for their guidance. The difficulties in the case of York had been artificially raised, and were not much worthy of their Lordships' attention.

LORD HAMPTON, who was inaudible, said a few words in reply.

HARES (IRELAND) BILL.

(The Viscount Massereene.)

(NO. 89.) COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

EARL SPENCER said, that this was a Bill for making a close time in Ireland for hares, and he would like to have some explanation from those who had charge of the Bill as to the necessity for such a measure, which would make the law in Ireland different to that in England, and might lead to considerable difficulties.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY also considered that there should be a statement made as to the expected operations of the Bill.

THE EARL OF COURTOWN said, that the Bill would not be objected to by the farmers of Ireland, as hares were nearly extinct in that country.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE said, that he had a good supply of hares on his property, and thought it would be injurious to prevent hares being killed where there were growing crops.

Amendments made: the Report thereof to be received on Thursday next.

CONVENTION (IRELAND) ACT REPEAL BILL.—(No. 77.)

(The Lord O'Hagan.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

Moved, “That the House do now resolve itself into Committee upon the said Bill.”—(The Lord O'Hagan.)

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE said, that the Act proposed to be repealed was passed by the Irish Parliament in 1797, and he would like to know why it was to be abolished, seeing that recently there had been meetings in Ireland of a Communistic character? He thought that Ireland was in a less satisfactory state now than it had been for some years past; and, therefore, he could not understand why the Act should be repealed.

LORD O'HAGAN said, the Bill was only intended to repeal legislation which had become entirely obsolete, and came before their Lordships, not only with the sanction of the Government, but the unanimous approval of the House of Commons.

Motion agreed to; House in Committee.

Bill reported without Amendment; an Amendment made; and Bill to be read 3^d To-morrow.

SPAIN—CONTRABAND TRADE AT GIBRALTAR—CASE OF THE “ROSSLYN.”

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE DUKE OF ST. ALBANS rose to call attention to the case of the “Rosslyn,” and asked, What instructions are given to the police and Custom authorities at Gibraltar to prevent contraband trade with Spain; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will lay upon the Table any recent Correspondence relative to this question or to a demarcation of the waters of the Bay of Gibraltar? The noble Duke said, the Rosslyn, as appeared by a letter from Lloyd's agent, published in the newspapers, was a British ship, which had received several tons of tobacco at Gibraltar to transfer to another vessel off the coast of Spain. On arriving at the rendezvous, however, the Rosslyn, instead of finding her consort, was seized by Spanish guarda-costas and taken into Cadiz. Mr. Perry, the English Consul, demanding and obtained her release—on what grounds it was not stated. But it was to be hoped that such an act of open smuggling could not be committed under the British Flag with impunity. It was well known that contraband trade was carried on with Spain to a considerable extent from Gibraltar. He would not enter into the question how far Spanish officials connived at this; but it seemed to him that, if it was necessary that we should hold Gibraltar, we ought to make our position there as little galling as possible to Spain. If a corresponding state of things existed in the Isle of Wight, this country would certainly not be disposed to tolerate it. Those of their Lordships who knew Gibraltar would be aware of the constant disputes and reprisals which the uncertainty existing as to the limits of British and Spanish waters gave rise to; and he should be glad to hear that there was some likelihood of the maritime jurisdiction of the two countries in this respect being defined. Our legitimate trade with Spain was of considerable importance. His personal experience was that an English vessel was received in a Spanish port with kindness and courtesy; and he hoped to be told that the British Government were prepared to do all that lay in their power to prevent the good understanding between the two countries being jeopardized by the existence of a state of things at Gibraltar such as the scandal of the Rosslyn had revealed.

EARL CADOGAN, in reply, said, Her Majesty's Government had no information on the subject of the Rosslyn which the noble Duke (the Duke of St. Albans) did not himself possess. He (Earl Cadogan) was not in a position to say whether the Consul at Cadiz had or had not demanded the release of the vessel; but the fact that the vessel had been released seemed to show that the Spanish authorities did not feel very strongly in the matter. Smuggling did, no doubt, prevail to a great extent at Gibraltar. It had occupied the attention of both the late Government and the present one; and from Correspondence which had been laid upon the Table, their Lordships would see that the present Governor of Gibraltar (Lord Napier of Magdala) had made various suggestions for the suppression of the traffic. Those recommendations had been embodied in an Order in Council which was issued in 1878. An increased fine was imposed for landing goods after dark, and the Governor stated that smuggling had materially diminished in consequence. Any later Correspondence than that already laid on the Table could not be conveniently produced. Correspondence was in progress with reference to the demarcation of the waters; but it was of a confidential nature at present, and could not, therefore, be produced.

LORD NAPIER OF MAGDALA said, that the Government of Gibraltar had no control over the ordinary transactions of the trade of a free port. Ships called, and deposited or carried away such cargoes as they pleased; and unless these consisted of spirits or wine, or munitions of war, the Local Government possessed no rights to interfere with them. But that particular form of smuggling which had been carried on by small vessels that left the port in the evening, and, abusing the protection afforded by the British fortifications, stole round the Rock about dusk, waiting for darkness to enable them to elude the Spanish preventive boats, had been virtually put an end to. By the means and regulations which the Colonial Government had placed in the hands of the Local Government, such strict vigilance was exercised that it was very difficult for boats to leave the port after the hour when it was prohibited. Boats found loitering about the Rock were sent back to the port, and a breach of the port regulations was punishable by a fine of £100. Another form of smuggling had been practised by Spaniards, who visited Gibraltar daily, and in returning were in the habit of sitting down on the neutral ground, beyond the control of the British sentries, and then undressing, and concealing their tobacco, in order to pass the Custom House officers at their own barriers. At the request of the Spanish Consul (Senor Jan Juan), whose courtesy and friendliness in all international questions had been as remarkable as his honest attention to the interests of his own country, he (Lord Napier of Magdala) permitted our policemen to cause these people to move on beyond the half of the neutral ground nearest the fortress, and the Spanish police looked after the other half. By these means the practice had been practically stopped, though any relaxation of vigilance would allow it to revive. From some observations which appeared in one of the daily papers some time ago, there would appear to be a misapprehension regarding the conduct of the local authorities, to the effect that they did not do all in their power to prevent smuggling; but the truth was that they really did all that the law allowed them, and even step beyond it, out of consideration for the Spanish Government, and to avoid any ground of complaint.

The Duke of St. Albans

ARMY—ARMY ORGANIZATION— DEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE.

QUESTIONS. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD TRURO rose to ask, Whether Her Majesty's Government have finally determined to appoint an exclusively military Committee to inquire into the defects of our present military organization? The noble Lord said, he had put a Question upon the subject before the Recess; but he was met with silence. The Government was one of silence and surprises; but he wished to know what it was they now purposed to do? Not long ago, our Army had been spoken of as in a condition to go through three campaigns; but it now appeared that the country had been seriously deluded, and the Government had at last been compelled to take some steps to put the Army in a proper condition for the defence of the country. It was proposed to appoint what was called a military Committee; and if the question were one of military discipline or of the size of regiments, he could well understand why it should be confined to military men. Some military authorities declared that the Army was in a rotten condition; we had come to a positive deadlock; and the question was, whether the rottenness was in the system of the noble Viscount (Viscount Cardwell), or in the administration of that system. He did not think that the system as introduced by the noble Viscount was a rotten one; but he thought that the system had not been wisely or loyally administered by the noble Viscount opposite (Viscount Cranbrook), in the passing of three-years' men into the Reserves, which was not the system of the late Government. The Government had been carrying out a foreign policy which, in some respects, would not be condemned; but, at the same time, they had quite forgotten their defences at home. The Secretary of State for India (Viscount Cranbrook) spoke in a joyous spirit the other day at Sheffield of our military success in Afghanistan; but that could not be dignified by the name of a war—it was merely a military promenade; while in South Africa, where we had war, we had neither success nor progress. In reply to a Question in "another place," the Secretary of State for War (Colonel Stanley) had expressed the hope that he would obtain for this Committee men of impartial mind, free from prejudice and preconceived opinions; but it was hopeless to expect such impartiality and freedom from prejudice in military men. The question which those gentlemen would have to discuss and to inquire into would not be those affecting military discipline; but they would have to ascertain what obstacles existed to men enlisting, and other things, and how military requirements were to be met; and, therefore, it was specially desirable that there should be a large civil element on the Committee.

The EARL OF GALLOWAY, who had given Notice of his intention to ask—(1.) Whether the Committee has yet been nominated who are to report upon the present state of our Army organization; and, if so, whether there is any objection to state their names: (2.) Whether there will be any objection to lay upon the Table of this House a Copy of the instructions which have been issued, or are about to be issued to this Committee? said, that he would put them now, so as to save the noble Viscount the trouble of speaking twice. He desired their Lordships to recall what had happened on this subject during the last few months. After a sleep of somewhat inexplicable length, the Secretary of State for War at length awoke to the fact that the British Army was in a state of collapse. It appeared to him (the Earl of Galloway) that it must have been well known to the authorities at the War Office three or four months ago that the British Army was in the state which he had described. He would not, however, enter into any details on the subject on the present occasion; but, taking into account the state of the organization of the Army, the country had, he thought, a right to expect that by this time the Committee would have been appointed and would have commenced its labours. Seeing the delay which had occurred, he was afraid that Parliament would be prorogued before the public had ascertained what it was really in the contemplation of the Government to do. The question was a very serious one; and he felt certain that if a board of general officers were appointed, they would at once condemn the brigade dépôt system for its imbecility as well as its extravagance, and that the short service system would be found to be open to the charge of inhumanity, as was testified by the hospitals throughout the country.

VISCOUNT BURY thought the Questions which had been put to him by his noble and gallant Friends admitted of being very easily answered, and that he could give very satisfactory reasons why the matter to which they related should be left to be inquired into by a Committee composed exclusively of military men. He had, therefore, to state that it was the intention of the Government to appoint a purely military Committee. It had been very freely said out-of-doors that our present military system was not satisfactory, and, up to a certain point, the Government had admitted that such was the case. They knew that there were defects in the system. His noble Friend behind him (the Earl of Longford) had said the other day that it had been described as positively rotten; but he had taken care to add that he did not altogether endorse that opinion. But, be that as it might, a very strong opinion had, at all events, been expressed in many quarters, both outside and inside the House, that our present military system was not satisfactory, and the Government, as he had already said, admitted, to a certain extent, that there was some justification in that view. They had succeeded to a mode of administering the Army which had been inaugurated by their Predecessors in Office, and which they had determined loyally to carry out. It had, after many debates, been decided that the present system should have a fair trial; and the system under which the Army was now worked was the result partly of the action of their Predecessors, and partly of their own action working on the lines which had been laid down. It having been found, however, that there were a good many defects in the system which the Government did not wish to conceal, the only course open to them was to institute an inquiry to decide whether it should be continued, and whether, if continued, some of its defects might not be removed. His Royal Highness the illustrious Duke on the cross-benches (the Duke of Cambridge), and other military Advisers of the Secretary of State for War, had repeatedly pointed out, especially of late, the defects of the system; and the very natural question had been asked of them, what they would advise to be done? The illustrious Duke had given in the most loyal and straightforward manner his advice; but, on consultation, the Secretary of State for War thought it would be more satisfactory that a Committee of military men should be appointed to investigate the subject. There seemed, he might add, to be a good deal of misunderstanding as to what were to be the aims and objects of the Committee. It was supposed that they were to draw up some new scheme for the re-organization of the Army and armed with the powers necessary for carrying it into effect. That, however, was not the case. What the Government required was the advice of competent military authorities in the matter. When such a Committee made their Report, it would then be for the Government to decide what further action would be necessary. If, of course, the Committee should be of opinion that the system was rotten, then the matter would be referred back to the Government, to be dealt with in the ordinary Constitutional way in consultation with both Houses of Parliament. But if the Committee confined themselves, as they possibly might, to suggesting certain alterations of detail, then these points would be referred to the Secretary of State, and would be dealt with by him. The question was not of appointing an Executive Committee to make a new re-organization of the Army, but simply a consultative body to advise the Government, and that was the reason why the Government had deemed it desirable to appoint a purely military Committee. The names of the Members of the Committee would, he might add, be known in a very few days. His right hon. and gallant Friend the Secretary of State had, indeed, he believed, in consultation with the illustrious Duke and others, determined on the names of those of whom it would be composed, and he hoped those names would be very shortly laid on the Table of the House. He was not, however, prepared to lay them on the Table that evening; while as to the instructions, he did not think it would be fair to the Committee, in the case of an inquiry of such delicacy, or convenient to the Public Service, that they should be produced. The Committee, he had every reason to hope, would soon meet. They would probably not occupy a very long time in prosecuting their labours, and the result of their deliberations would then be laid before Parliament.

The Earl of Galloway

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK said, that as the administration of the Army by him, as a Member of the Government, had been attacked, he wished to say a few words, although it might seem unnecessary that he should do so, seeing that the noble Lord opposite (Lord Truro), as well as his noble Friend behind him (the Earl of Galloway), from whom the attack came, seemed to hold perfectly opposite views on the subject—the one being of opinion that the system which had been established by his Predecessor at the War Office was perfect, while the other maintained that it was absolutely rotten. Still, it might appear disrespectful not to notice the personal attack of the noble Lord opposite. The noble Lord opposite had, he believed, commanded several regiments, and if he had continued to command them, it was probable that he should have heard from him more soldierly advice than he had given that evening with regard to waiting for six years to pass men into the Reserve. There were countries when men, after one year's service, passed into the Reserve; but there was abundant military authority for saying that a soldier might be thoroughly trained in three years, and, after such service, might be advantageously passed into the Reserve. It had been tested by experience; and he ventured to ask military men who had seen the Reserve Force when called out last year, whether the three years' men had not presented a thoroughly soldierly appearance? He could appeal to the illustrious Duke's personal inspection of them. If the noble Lord's advice had been followed, and the Reserves had consisted only of men who had been six years in the Army, there would have been a very different show of the Reserve on that occasion. He was fully conscious that many shortcomings would be perceived in his administration of the War Department. He found on entering upon it that measures had been passed with great care and caution by the Parliament of this country which had instituted a particular system. He felt certain, from the very beginning, that a sudden change would be as inconsistent with the safety of the Army as it would be inconsistent with the interests of the country. He, therefore, determined to give the best aid he could to a full development of the system set on foot. In many respects he might have acted differently from the way in which his noble Friend (Viscount Cardwell) would have done if he had been in Office; but his object was to develop the system, and bring it to as great perfection as possible. And when he was told now that the system was rotten, and that everything about the Army was rotten, he utterly denied that that assertion had any foundation in fact. If the Afghanistan War was merely a military promenade, as the noble Lord (Lord Truro) said, that was owing to the fact that it was carefully and methodically pre-arranged and carried out by soldiers who were competent to discharge the duty. He entirely differed from the view that a war must be considered unsuccessful, or a mere promenade, because it had not led to an infinity of battles and bloodshed. On the contrary, he thought the skill of a general was more shown in bringing a war to a successful termination without disaster and without bloodshed. He did not deny that the system had its defects, nor that they did not get a great many young soldiers; but he was prepared to say that if it had been arranged, as it would be in a European war, to mingle the Reserves with the regiments, we should have presented as strong a front as at any period of our history. The evil of young soldiers entering the Army at premature ages was not one which was connected with short service alone; but it had been connected with recruiting at all times, because it happened that in this country employments were readily found, and when men of 19 or 20 obtained employment, they did not turn from those pursuits to enter into the Army. The question of recruiting would be very properly considered by the Committee. He ought not to detain their Lordships; but with regard to the attacks which had been made upon him, he might observe that as they had been made by both sides upon exactly opposite grounds they could not be right, and he did not think that he was altogether wrong.

LORD DORCHESTER said, if the nomination of a Committee took five weeks, the question was, indeed, a difficult one to decide, and the difficulties of searching into it must be far greater than there was any reason to suppose. An eminent General had been sent for to preside over this Committee; but he was ordered by the civil power—the Secretary of State—entirely unknown to the illustrious Duke (the Duke of Cambridge), to a mixed command in South Africa. If rumour was correct, the Committee was to be composed of men who were committed to the present system, and who, therefore, would not be likely to report against it. He thought it necessary that the names of the Committee should be speedily known.

LORD WAVENEY said, one of the points which it would be necessary for the Committee to inquire into was the subject of recruiting in agricultural districts. He had the honour of commanding an agricultural brigade of Artillery for 25 years, and he could say that at present the men were superior in intelligence and physical development to those whom he first received into the ranks. There was an improved disposition as to binding themselves with regard to the Reserve; but as to volunteering for the war in South Africa, the Return he had to make was nil. He hoped the Committee would go fully into the question of recruiting. The point was how to retain the old soldier in the Service. Above all things, he trusted the Committee would consider what was the enormous friction of a great war machine, and how soon a campaign in the field frittered away the best of the strength of the Army.

VISCOUNT CARDWELL said, much had been stated with regard to the Committee being entirely a military one, and that it would leave out a large part of what ought to be included. He had no such apprehension. He knew by whom the Committee was to be composed. The noble Lord who, he understood, was to be President, Lord Airey—there was, perhaps, no harm in mentioning the name—was an experienced soldier, who would never forget the absence of a Reserve in the Crimean War. He (Viscount Cardwell) had confidence in Lord Airey, and he was sure the day would never come when that gallant soldier would forget the absolute necessity of a Reserve when the Army was in the field. In Lord Airey's hands the fate of the inquiry was safe. He hoped and believed that it was intended to make this inquiry, not superficial, but complete; and except upon the supposition that it was to be a complete inquiry he should be fearful of the result, for he knew the prejudices with which an inquiry of this kind had to contend. With these few final words, he commended the Committee to the approval of their Lordships.

Viscount Cranbrook

House adjourned at a quarter before Eight o'clock, till To-morrow.
half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 16th June, 1879.

MINUTES.]—SUPPLY—considered in Committee
—ARMY ESTIMATES, Votes 1 to 6.
EAST INDIA REVENUE ACCOUNTS—considered in Committee—Resolution [June 13] reported.
PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Indian Marine
[182]; Salmon Fishery Law Amendment
(No. 2) [188].
Committee—Report—Common Law Procedure and Judicature Acts Amendment* [181].
Considered as amended—Customs and Inland Revenue* [150]; Bills of Sale (Ireland)*
[45].
Withdrawn—Church of Scotland* [39].

QUESTIONS.

CYPRUS—THE ORDINANCES.

QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he will re-consider his determination not to print as Parliamentary Papers even those of the Cyprus Ordinances, which are as peculiar in their nature as the following—namely, the Ordinance of 1879, giving power to the Cyprus Government to exile persons without trial; the Ordinance of 1878, prohibiting the sale of land in Cyprus to all persons not British or Turkish subjects; and the Ordinance of 1879, raising special taxation on all lands left uncultivated, and forfeiting unclaimed lands to the Government?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, he would place in the Library of the House Copies of the Ordinances referred to by the hon. Baronet; but he did not propose to lay them on the Table.

IRELAND—THE FISHERIES OF SLIGO AND THE BONET RIVER.—QUESTION.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If it would not be desirable to hold an investigation into the manner in which the fisheries of the Sligo Fisheries and the Bonet River, County Leitrim, have been managed by Mr. Brady, Inspector of Fisheries, having regard to the fact that it has been shown by a Return furnished to the Government, at an inspection ordered by the Chief Secretary for Ireland, that the quantity of salmon taken in these fisheries has considerably diminished since the year 1862 up to the present date, in consequence of bye-laws enacted by Mr. Brady, Inspector of Fisheries?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, I have not yet been able to get a full Report. If the Question is repeated, I shall be able to say more in a few days. I find an inquiry has been held into the matter by three Inspectors; so that the name of Mr. Brady ought only to be mentioned in conjunction with that of his colleagues.

LOCAL FINANCE—ANNUAL STATEMENT—THE PUBLIC WORKS LOAN BILL.—QUESTIONS.

MR. PELL asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, When Her Majesty's Government desire to make the Annual Statement on Local Finance which it was understood would be considered at the same time as the Budget?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, my hon. Friend asks when we "desire" to make the Statement to which he refers in his Question. We desire, of course, to make it as soon as possible; but with regard to what we propose to do, I have some little difficulty on account of the course of Business. It is essential that we should make that Statement soon, and obtain the authority of the House for the issue of what will be necessary for next year of the Public Works Loan. If we do not obtain that authority early in July, there will be serious difficulty, because there will be no funds to carry on the works. I hope, therefore, we may be able next week—say on Thursday week—to bring forward that proposal, and I shall connect it with the Public Works Loan Bill now before the House, trusting to introduce into that Bill a clause to give us the necessary powers.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN asked, If the Government intended to withdraw the Public Works Loan Bill now before the House?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: No; the Bill I now refer to is the annual Bill authorizing the advances of the Commissioners.

INDIA—PETITION OF MR. WILLIAM TAYLER—SIR FREDERICK HALLIDAY.—QUESTIONS.

MR. STAVELEY HILL asked the Under Secretary of State for India, with reference to a Petition presented to the House in February last by Mr. William Tayler, to which the attention of the House is to be called on the 1st proximo by the honourable Member for South Warwickshire, and in which the conduct of Sir Frederick Halliday, formerly Lieutenant Governor of Bengal, is seriously impugned, Whether any statement of the case has been submitted to the Secretary of State by Sir Frederick Halliday; and, if so, whether there will be any objection to lay such statement upon the Table of the House?

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the statement of Sir Frederick Halliday, referred to by the honourable and learned Member for Staffordshire, is a reply to the Petition of Mr. William Tayler, presented in February last to this House; or, whether it is a reply of some standing to memorials presented by Mr. Tayler to successive Secretaries of State, and especially to a Memorial addressed by him to the Duke of Argyll in 1868?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir, it is true that a statement has been prepared by Sir Frederick Halliday, at my request, in view of the debate to be brought on by my hon. Friend the Member for South Warwickshire. It refers to a number of official documents contained in many volumes at the India Office. The question of producing that statement, or the official documents generally, is one of great difficulty. On the one hand, Sir Frederick Halliday, after many years of useful public service in India, has been exposed to violent attacks in several pamphlets, and I venture to express my respect for the forbearance which he has displayed, knowing that he could only defend himself by official documents. But, on the other hand, no public matter is involved, the Motion of the hon. Member for South Warwickshire raises no such question; and, therefore, my noble Friend does not, upon the whole, consider himself justified, either in producing the statement or the Papers generally, or in putting the country to the great expense of printing them.

NORTHERN BORNEO—CESSION OF TERRITORY.—QUESTIONS.

MR. W. E. FORSTER asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the cession of territory in Northern Borneo to a British Trading Company would, if approved by Her Majesty's Government, involve any responsibility on the part of this country; and, if so, what responsibility?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, the approval of this proposed cession would not, as far as we know, involve any responsibility on the part of this country other than the general responsibility which devolves on Her Majesty's Government of affording protection to British subjects in all parts of the world, so far as circumstances permit. But Her Majesty's Government have not at present given any such approval.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Will the hon. Gentleman inform the House, why the approval of Her Majesty's Government is asked, if there is no responsibility incurred?

MR. BOURKE: That is a Question rather for the persons who ask for the approval, than for Her Majesty's Government.

REPRODUCTIVE LOAN FUND (IRELAND)—LOANS TO CLARE FISHERMEN.—QUESTION.

LORD FRANCIS CONYNNGHAM asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If it is true that several cases have lately occurred in Clare County, where, default having been made by fishermen in the repayment of an instalment of money borrowed by them from the Irish Reproductive Loan Fund, they have been forced by legal process not only to repay the sums remaining undischarged, but also to pay over again the instalments which they had already paid before default?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, I do not find that the matters have proceeded to the extremity the noble Lord's Question seems to indicate; but there were some difficulties of a legal character with regard to these loans. The Board of Works have been asked to report on the matter, and arrangements have been made which I hope will obviate all difficulties in the future.

IRELAND—VOTE FOR CHIEF SECRETARY'S OFFICE.—QUESTION.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE asked the Secretary to the Treasury, When Vote 35, Class 2, Chief Secretary for Ireland's Offices, will be taken?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: I feel that I can give no very definite answer to the Question of the hon. and gallant Member. The Vote will be taken as soon as we are able to fix a day for commencing with Irish Votes, and Class 2 will be taken when we have disposed of Votes in Class 1.

JAMAICA—COOLIES.—QUESTION.

MR. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, If his attention has been directed to a paragraph in the "New York Times," dated 30th May, which stated that a ship had arrived at Kingston, Jamaica, to carry back Coolies who had been serving under an indenture for employers in the parish of Charleston, and who, during the time of their servitude, had deposited large sums of money in the hands of the immigration agent for safe keeping: whether, on asking for it, they were told he could not pay it to them, and they were thereby defrauded; if it be true that the Governor of Jamaica refused to give protection to the immigrants in the matter, though the Chief Justice had stated they were entitled to be paid; and, further, if they have been paid?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Sir, the hon. Member has been good enough to send me the article in The New York Times upon which this Question is based. I had heard reports that a sub-immigration agent in Jamaica had improperly received money, by himself or his son, from the Coolies for whom he was responsible; but I knew nothing of the other statements quoted from the article, and I have at once directed the Governor to supply me with a full report on the subject.

EGYPT—MR. VIVIAN—THE PAPERS.
QUESTIONS.

MR. OTWAY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Mr. Vivian has been recalled from his post as Consul General in Egypt; and, if so, for what reason; whether Mr. Adams has been appointed to succeed Mr. Vivian; and, when the Papers relating to Egyptian matters will be laid upon the Table of the House?

MR. BOURKE: No, Sir; Mr. Vivian has not been recalled from his post. Mr. Vivian has been permitted to come home for a short time on private affairs—affairs strictly of a private character—but it is not likely that Mr. Vivian's return to Egypt will be delayed beyond a few weeks. With regard to the next Question, Mr. Adams has not been appointed to succeed Mr. Vivian; but Mr. Lascelles, who for some time discharged Mr. Vivian's duties when he was absent for a short time, will again discharge the duties now. With regard to the Papers on Egyptian affairs, Her Majesty's Government have considered the subject very carefully, and are most anxious to produce them; but they are of opinion, under existing circumstances, that it would not be to the public interest to do so at the present moment.

MR. OTWAY asked when they would be produced?

MR. BOURKE: It depends on the communications now going on, when the Papers can be produced. The circumstances, I need not say, are not altogether in the control of Her Majesty's Government.

MR. WHITWELL asked, if Mr. Lascelles was acting as Consul General?

MR. BOURKE: He will perform the same functions which he performed before. I cannot understand that his position will be in any way different from that which Mr. Vivian's has been.

THE RAILWAY COMMISSION BILL—LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

MR. MONK asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he is prepared to name a day on which he will ask leave to introduce the proposed Railway Commission Bill?

VISCOUNT SANDON, in reply, said, he was not surprised at the anxiety manifested by the hon. Gentleman; but, in the present state of Public Business, it was impossible to name a day. It would be impossible, however, for Her Majesty's Government to allow the powers of the Royal Commission to lapse this year; and he was as anxious as the hon. Gentleman was to bring in the Bill; but he could not name a day.

VICTORIA—THE CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTION.—QUESTION.

MR. A. MILLS asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, When his despatch to Lord Normanby, relating to the differences between the two Houses of the Legislature of the Colony of Victoria, will be laid upon the Table of the House; and, whether any further Correspondence has taken place on the subject since that already presented to Parliament?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Sir, the despatch to Lord Normanby should reach Melbourne in about 10 days from this time, and I propose shortly after that date to present it, together with other Correspondence on the subject, to Parliament.

NAVY—COALING AT ST. VINCENT'S.
QUESTION.

COLONEL BERESFORD asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, How many tons of coal were supplied to the Transports at St. Vincent for the voyage to the Cape, at what price per ton it was supplied, and how many days each Transport was delayed in order to obtain the necessary quantity?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Sir, I stated, in reply to the Question of the hon. Member for Hastings (Mr. T. Brassey), both how many tons of coal were supplied to the transports, and how long each vessel was occupied in coaling, and I think my hon. and gallant Friend will hardly wish me to repeat that statement; but the price at which the coal was supplied—the entire cost—was 28s. a-ton in two cases, 30s. in the case of 10 ships, and 32s. in the case of two other ships.

CRIMINAL CODE BILL—MEMORANDUM OF THE LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.

QUESTIONS.

MR. HERSCHELL asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether he has received a memorandum from the Lord Chief Justice containing comments and suggestions in relation to the Criminal Code Bill, and, whether he will lay a Copy of the same upon the Table of the House?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER), in reply, said, he had received the Memorandum from the Lord Chief Justice in relation to the Criminal Code Bill, and he would be happy to lay it on the Table of the House.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he had that day laid on the Table of the House the Report of the Commissioners in relation to the Code.

MR. WHEELHOUSE asked, If it was intended to print the Report?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Certainly.

ARMY—THE 42ND REGIMENT.

QUESTIONS.

MR. H. SAMUELSON asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the 42nd Regiment is still suffering from the effects of the Cyprus fever; and, whether it is about to be brought home before the usual time in consequence of the ill-health of the men?

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, the report of the health of the men of the 42nd Highlanders was not altogether satisfactory, and as there was likely to be a certain amount of fever at Gibraltar, it was thought expedient that this regiment should not be left there.

MR. H. SAMUELSON: Will the right hon. and gallant Gentleman please answer the first part of my Question?

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, I cannot say whether the men are suffering from Cyprus fever, because some of the men have suffered from fever contracted at the West Coast of Africa.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—THE FIGHT AT RORKE'S DRIFT.

QUESTION.

MR. STACPOOLE asked the Secretary of State for War, If an order was issued by his or any other authority that in consideration of the gallantry displayed by the non-commissioned officers and privates at Rorke's Drift the issue of one flannel shirt and a pair of trousers to each man, in compensation for damage done to their clothing is sanctioned?

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, so far as I can understand, such an order was issued by the General Officer commanding troops for the issue to the men of flannel shirt and one pair of trousers, in compensation for damage done to their clothing. Whether regard was had to it as a reward for gallantry or not I cannot say.

ARMY—BEARDS.—QUESTION.

MR. STACPOOLE asked the Secretary of State for War, If he sees any objection to permit all ranks of the Army to wear their beards, in accordance with the example set by Field Marshal H.R.H. the Prince of Wales, H.S. the Prince of Saxe-Weimar, commanding the Southern District, and by the officers and men of the Royal Navy?

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, I do not presume, looking at all the bearded faces around me, to express an opinion whether any alleviation would be desirable or not; but, as a matter of fact, whether beards are allowed to be worn or not, there are any sanitary reasons—climate or otherwise—the Queen's Regulations say that troops at home shall not wear beards, and from that there is no reason to depart.

MR. STACPOOLE gave Notice that on going into Committee on the Army Estimates he should call attention to the subject.

IRELAND—FORCIBLE DISPERSION
A MEETING AT COOKSTOWN.

QUESTIONS.

MR. CALLAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether his attention has been drawn to the report which appeared in the "Freeman's Journal" of Friday, June 13, wherein it is stated that a meeting convened by the following placard extensively circulated:—

"The Irish University Bill. A public meeting will be held in Cookstown on Thursday, 12th June, to support The O'Connor Don's University Bill. Chair to be taken at two o'clock. Friends of denominational education are earnestly requested to attend;"

was dispersed and forcibly prevented from holding the meeting, by the police numbering upwards of one hundred men, under arms, under the command of Captain Waring, R.M., Mr. J. B. Moore, J.P., and County Inspector Murphy; that the authorities, through Captain Waring, ordered the police to charge, who did so at the double, and the processionists were thrown into the utmost confusion and were most unceremoniously huddled backwards at the point of a double line of bayonets; is it a fact, as stated in the same report, that—

"The processionists were most orderly, nothing in the way of drunkenness being in the slightest degree visible," and that "for several years the town has been the scene of recurring saturnalias of the Orange party, and nothing in the way of let or hindrance goes to mar their proceedings;"

whether Her Majesty's Government approve of such conduct on the part of Captain Waring and the police authorities, and are prepared to deny to the Catholics of Tyrone the right of public meeting to petition Parliament in favour of a Bill under the consideration of this House; and, whether any orders or instructions have been given by the Irish Executive to the said magistrates or inspector; and, if so, what is the purport of these orders or instructions, and is there any objection to lay them upon the Table of this House?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, I have seen the newspaper report to which the hon. Member refers; and the report, read in extenso, appears to give a very accurate account of the proceedings in question, although the extracts, taken by themselves, hardly convey a correct account of what took place. It appears, from what I am able to learn from all sources, that the procession was formed for the purpose of holding a meeting at a particular place. Among the processionists were men armed with revolvers and other weapons, which they appear to have made use of on their line of march when engaged in wrecking houses. There was also collected on the route proposed to be taken by the procession an opposition crowd, likewise armed, and posted there avowedly to stop the processionists by force. Sworn informations having been made that a breach of the peace was likely to occur, the resident magistrate, very properly as I think, prevented a collision by impartially dispersing both crowds. No special instructions were given by the Government as to the course to be adopted by the authorities on the spot, which appears to me to have been judicious as well as successful, and to have prevented a serious breach of the peace.

MR. CALLAN: I beg to ask, in addition, as the right hon. Gentleman has referred to various sources of information, Whether it is on the authority of the police he states that the processionists were armed with revolvers?

MR. J. LOWTHER: I made that statement on official information received—not any special report, but information from various sources.

MR. CALLAN: I want to ask if the information is from the authorities?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Yes, certainly; from the authorities, but not solely from the police.

MR. O'DONNELL: Sir, I had a Notice on the Paper to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If it is true that a public meeting in favour of the Irish University Bill has been prevented in the County Tyrone by a body of constabulary charging with fixed bayonets a peaceful procession? but I will not now put the right hon. Gentleman to the trouble of answering it. However, I beg to give Notice that I will call attention, at an early opportunity, to the support of illegal associations by Her Majesty's Government in the North of Ireland.

IRELAND—REGISTRARS OF COUNTY COURTS.—QUESTION.

MR. MELDON asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether any, and, if so, what measures have been taken to place the position of Registrars of the County Courts in Ireland on a satisfactory and permanent basis as to salary and duties?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Gibson): The Lord Chancellor of Ireland has recently requested the Judges of the County Courts to meet and to select some of their body to confer with him as regards the duties of the Registrars.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE TRANSVAAL.
QUESTION.

MR. COURTNEY asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he will lay on the Table a despatch of Sir Bartle Frere, which has been telegraphed to the "Standard" some time ago, relating to his interview with the Boers of the Transvaal, and to a memorial which they have presented to him for transmission to the home Government; also, whether the right hon. Gentleman is able to confirm the report which has since appeared, that the Volksraad of the Orange Free State have passed a resolution recommending the restoration of the independence of the Transvaal?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I have received no information as to the resolution stated to have been passed by the Volksraad of the Orange Free State. The despatch from Sir Bartle Frere, which was telegraphed to The Standard, has reached me; but I cannot yet state when it can be presented to Parliament, as I think it would be fair to Sir Bartle Frere that other despatches which he has sent from the Transvaal should be published together with it, if this can be done without injury to the Public Service; and some of them must be still on their way, as the last received was dated some days before he left the Transvaal.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

[Progress.]

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.
(In the Committee.)

(1.) £50,600, Divine Service.

MR. PARNELL said, it would be very interesting to many people in Ireland, if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would state to the Committee what provision he had made for the spiritual wants of the Roman Catholic soldiers serving in South Africa. By a Return recently moved for and made in that House, it appeared that some of the regiments now employed in South Africa were very largely composed of Roman Catholic soldiers, and he and others were desirous to know what arrangements had been made for sending Roman Catholic chaplains out there to minister to the spiritual wants of the men.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he stated a few days ago what number of Catholic chaplains had been sent out to the Cape. That number was proportioned, as they considered it, to the ordinary requirements of a Force of the description now serving in South Africa. He also stated that he awaited, before sending any further chaplains out—Roman Catholic or otherwise—some demand from the General Officer commanding the Forces. He understood that there were clergymen of all denominations on the spot, whose services could be secured; and that a certain number of them had been employed under the general powers which the General Officer commanding possessed. He (Colonel Stanley) was not aware of any want in that respect, and until such want was notified to him, he did not think it necessary to send out more than the usual proportion of chaplains.

MR. SULLIVAN said, he was sorry to find, from private communications he had had from South Africa, that matters in this respect were by no means as satisfactory as he was sure the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War could himself wish. With very great respect personally, for now he was simply dealing with the Office the right hon. and gallant Gentleman held, he was bound to say that he could not accept the doctrine laid down by the Secretary of State for War—namely, that he was not to make provision for the spiritual wants of the soldiers serving abroad until some complaint was made to him on the subject. Surely, the spiritual wants of the soldiers were worth caring for by anticipation, as well as other wants. He had no doubt that the personal desire of the Secretary of State for War was to do what was right; but the system he had advocated was most objectionable. He (Mr. Sullivan) trusted implicitly in the private accounts he had it had been clearly proved that that officer was not a Judge, that he was not an advocate, that he was not a general, and that his title was a very gross misnomer, conveying no idea whatever of the functions which that person was called upon to discharge. In turning over the pages of the Army Discipline Bill, on which they were promised an interesting discussion to-morrow, he found no attempt whatever had been made to remedy the complaints of the manner in which courts martial had hitherto been permitted to hear evidence; and it seemed to him that there was the real root of the difficulty with which they had to deal. If they could not raise an effective discussion in this Committee, he hoped that when that Bill came on they would insist on a proper investigation of the subject.

MAJOR NOLAN said, he would like to ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Judge Advocate General one or two questions about the forms of courts martial. He believed they were not treated of in any way in the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill, the old Military Act, or the Articles of War; and, therefore, they would not have an opportunity of discussing in Committee on that measure the subject he wished to raise. He wished to know whether the Department of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Stanley), or the military authorities, were responsible for the form in which these proceedings were conducted? They differed from Courts of Law, in that everything was required to be in writing. Where prisoners pleaded guilty in a civil Court, there was very little evidence taken, unless, in some exceptional cases, the Court desired it; while in a court martial the evidence was taken just the same, and it all had to be written exactly as if the prisoner were denying the accusations. In his opinion, all this was a very great waste of time, and he wanted to know who was responsible for it? Every question and every answer at present had either to be written out, and checked by six or seven members, or written by a clerk. The charge also had to be written: first, at the commencement of the proceedings; again, when given in evidence; and, thirdly, when the sentence was passed; although the man might only be charged with making away with a few of the articles of his kit. Very often, in the civil Courts, heavy cases, which took up a great deal of time before magistrates, were settled in three or four minutes at the trial by the prisoner pleading guilty. There was then a statement as to character, and sentence was given. But in a court martial all that evidence would have to be given again, and written out again. Another objection to this system of writing everything at length was that it was fatal to cross-examination. A witness who was giving false evidence or exaggerated evidence was put upon his guard, and was able to consider his replies in the intervals between the answers, so that all the value of cross-examination was lost. Again, this system told against questions, for though, of course, a prisoner might insist on having questions put when the Court objected, if he did so, it must tell against him with the Court. These were all points of considerable importance, and as he did not know how he could raise them on the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill, he should like to ask, now, who was responsible for the forms of court martial. Were they governed by the Military Act and the Articles of War? Was the Judge Advocate General responsible, or the military authorities? The present system, in his belief, was excessively bad, and not of the slightest use. Besides, the attention of the Court was centred on writing out the evidence rather than on considering its bearings. He did not, of course, mean to say that the verdicts of courts martial were not fair; but he did maintain that the system was a very great waste of time, and that it was often prejudicial to the prisoner.

MR. SULLIVAN considered it was evident that in the Office of Judge Advocate General they had either too much or too little. There could be no doubt that the judicial element in the Office ought to be strengthened for the protection of soldiers in the Army. It had been suggested that the Office should be made a permanent one. The officials there at present, no doubt, were efficient and, he believed, exceedingly able; but from the fact of the head of the Office being removable, there resulted, as had been said by the hon. and gallant Member for Brighton (General Shute), a great indecision and want of continuity in the supreme direction of affairs. It seemed to be a refuge for anyone in the necessity should rather devolve upon him than upon the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Judge Advocate General. So far as he (Colonel Stanley) was able to speak, both from personal knowledge and otherwise, he was bound to demur to the doctrine the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Major O'Beirne) had laid down, even though he might have quoted correctly the evidence given before the Select Committee by Mr. O'Dowd. That evidence, of course, required to be carefully examined, not only in itself, but in its context, and without having seen it, he did not feel in a position to express an opinion upon it. The Office of Judge Advocate General had been one which had been handed down from a remote time in one form or another; and there had always been felt to be a certain advantage in having, apart from the Administration of the Army, a perfectly independent tribunal to which courts martial could be sent, and which was not under the control of the War Office authorities. It had been always held that in having a Court of that nature considerable advantage resulted, both to the Service and to the soldier. The Office of Judge Advocate General must necessarily be, to a certain extent, influenced by the Bill which was now before the House, and he did not suppose that any office of that sort would be retained on the Estimates without due inquiry, and without their having satisfied themselves that every reason did exist for its maintenance. He was certainly not prepared at the present time, notwithstanding the arguments of the hon. and gallant Member (Major O'Beirne), or from what he had heard otherwise, to assent to the reduction of the Vote; but, on the contrary, he believed that the Judge Advocate General and his Office were very valuable, and ought to be preserved; because it was very desirable that there should be a careful examination of the proceedings of courts martial from an outside authority, such as the Judge Advocate General, who was entirely independent of the War Office. Up to the present, the Office had been attended with advantage, and he hoped the hon. and gallant Gentleman would not consider it his duty to press his Amendment at the present time, but allow the Vote to pass.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, he had a similar Amendment upon the Paper to the one which had just been proposed; but he had been induced to withdraw it without the slightest consultation whatever with the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Major O'Beirne), and for a very different purpose. The object he had in view was to raise a special point of military law, upon which there had recently been a very grave and lamentable difference of opinion on the part of the Department which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman himself (Colonel Stanley) represented. The subject had, of late, been debated with very considerable and momentous, and, in some respects, lamentable results to the Public Service. It was with regard to the interpretation of that clause of the Army Reserve Act of 1867 which related to the employment or non-employment, in the recent despatch of re-inforcements to the Cape, of those men of the Army Reserve who had expressed their willingness to volunteer for service. It would be in the recollection of hon. Members of the Committee, and in that of others, that very early in the present Session he asked a Question of the Secretary of State for War, as to whether he could not avail himself, under the 11th clause of the Army Reserve Act of 1867, and in the emergency which had recently occurred, of the very valuable and most efficient services of those men of the Army Reserve who were willing to volunteer for service? The answer which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman gave was in direct contradiction of the answer they received to a like Question last week. For this reason, it was necessary for the satisfaction of those persons interested in the matter that some explanation should be given. The answer which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War gave on the 21st of February to his (Sir Henry Havelock's) Question, as to whether the Army Reserve men who were willing to volunteer could be employed for service at the Cape, was as follows:—

Colonel Stanley

"Sir, as a matter of fact, I am not aware that any men of the Army Reserve have volunteered for service at the Cape, although I have no doubt, from all that I have heard, they would be very ready to do so if an opportunity were given. With regard to the second Question, I must speak with some reservation; but, as I am advised at present, the men who have joined the Army Reserve are covered by the Statute Law of 1867, under which they are allowed to serve upon two conditions—first, a Proclamation under section 10 in case of a national emergency; and, secondly, by volunteering for duty. Under the military authorities; but, on the contrary, were productive of great advantage to the Service.

MR. RYLANDS thought the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had clearly evaded the point which had been put by the hon. and gallant Member (Major O'Beirne). A distinct question had been asked. Could the Judge Advocate maintain the authority of his decisions? The reply was, that the Commander-in-Chief could no doubt disallow his decisions. The question was—had his decisions any legal force whatever? When they talked about the Office as a Court of Review, the question was, whether it was a Court with any power of maintaining its decisions? The question was, whether this Office of Judge Advocate General was not merely that of an assessor, who gave an opinion, but had no power to enforce it? He thought they were entitled to inquire into a matter of this kind, for, surely, when they paid a salary, they ought to be sure that the Office was something more than a name, and the officer something more than an assessor. They would vote this money with much more satisfaction, if they had reason to believe that steps would be taken to give the Office more authority. He quite agreed that it was very desirable that the post should be held by a barrister of high authority, because then they would be certain that justice would be given where it was not now always given.

MR. CALLAN had listened to the debate for some time; but he was even now in great difficulty as to what were the duties of the Judge Advocate General. Surely, as that right hon. and learned Gentleman was present, they ought to have, and it was most desirable they should have, an explanation from him, as to his powers and authorities. As a mere matter of respect, he should explain to the Committee what were the powers and authorities of the office, before they were asked to vote this sum of £2,000 as a salary.

MAJOR NOLAN pointed out that even now they did not know who was responsible for these forms. Was it the Secretary of State for War, or the judicial department, or the military department? Of course, as had been pointed out, it was sometimes necessary to go into the circumstances of the case, even where the prisoner pleaded guilty; but in the several cases to which he had referred that always could be done, if necessary. What he complained of was that the courts martial were obliged to try out a case, even when a man pleaded guilty where he was obviously guilty, and where, accordingly, much time was wasted in the procedure. He would suggest that some plan might be found for shortening this procedure. They might have shorthand writers in some cases, and where that was not possible, then they could follow the old plan. At present, it was necessary to put down every bit of evidence, even when no one desired it. People seemed to think that officers' time was of no value, and that, therefore, all this rubbish should be stuck down, when a slight change might save a great deal of work. For his part, he had never known anyone having experience on the subject who did not think that these proceedings might be shortened with great advantage.

COLONEL ALEXANDER remarked, that the procedure had been shortened a good deal of late by the adoption of printed forms, and he thought something more might be done in that direction. As to cases where a man pleaded guilty, he had known one where the prisoner was afterwards asked if he had anything to say, and his statement showed that he was not guilty.

COLONEL COLTHURST agreed that it would be very undesirable not to record the proceedings where men pleaded guilty, for he had known a case also where a man pleaded guilty, and afterwards made a long statement which showed that he always meant to plead not guilty.

MR. SULLIVAN would like to ask the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Brighton (General Shute), whether he correctly understood him to say that the decision of Sir Colman O'Loughlen, in the case of Sergeant Darrah, was overruled by the Commander-in-Chief?

GENERAL SHUTE replied that he never said anything of the kind.

MR. PARNELL thought it would be very satisfactory if the hon. and gallant General, in such circumstances, would inform the Committee what he actually did say. He (Mr. Parnell) listened very attentively to his statement. It was true that he did not

hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir Henry Havelock), he was bound to say that there was a very strong feeling in the Army that the public did not get out of the Office of Judge Advocate General as much advantage as they were entitled to, considering its cost. There was one duty which might very properly be put upon this Office—namely, the preparation of the Mutiny Bills which came before the House. The Judge Advocate General was specially appointed to interpret the Mutiny Act; but what did they now see? They had a Mutiny Bill before them, which had been prepared entirely by outsiders, by the civilian draftsmen of the Government. If ever there was a duty which might well devolve on the Judge Advocate General it was the preparation of the Mutiny Bill. He knew not what the expense might be of employing Sir Henry Thring to prepare the Bill; but he knew this—that he ought to receive a large sum indeed, to compensate him for the labour and trouble he had taken in the matter. There was a Judge Advocate General receiving £2,000 a-year, as well as a Legal Secretary at the War Office; but neither of them had anything to do with the preparation of the Bill. Another Gentleman had to be employed, who had told the Committee that he knew nothing of the subject. They need not, therefore, be surprised if the Bill was a long time in getting through the Committee. He was of opinion that the Judge Advocate General's Department ought to be employed more in connection with military affairs than they were, and there were many occasions on which the Judge Advocate General might rise in the House, with very great benefit, to explain certain questions and thus assist the Secretary of State for War, who was now undergoing a great strain in carrying the Army Bill through Parliament.

Mr. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, the various drafts and other matters had been constantly before the Office of the Judge Advocate General; but it was utterly impossible that the Judge Advocate General could prepare a Bill such as that now before the Committee, because he had not the means of doing so. As regarded himself, he was at all times perfectly ready to answer any question put to him, or to give any assistance to his right hon. and gallant Friend the Secretary of State for War, or to any

hon. Gentleman who chose to seek it. His right hon. and gallant Friend knew that he was willing to perform any part of the duty he had taken upon himself; but it was certainly not his desire to throw himself unduly before the House. He had now answered the question of the hon. and gallant Member (Sir Alexander Gordon), and he should be glad if he could afford any information to other hon. Gentlemen.

Mr. RYLANDS said, that it was not the wish of the Committee that, in the discussion in which they were now engaged, there should be even an appearance of a reflection upon the right hon. and learned Gentleman the present Judge Advocate General. Furthermore, in rising to take part in the discussion, it was not his wish, in any degree, to make remarks which might be personally distasteful to the right hon. and learned Gentleman; nor, in point of fact, did he wish to raise a question as to the ability with which the right hon. and learned Gentleman fulfilled the duties of his post. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War said, in justification of this Vote, that the Office of Judge Advocate General had been handed down from a remote period. No doubt, it had been handed down from a remote period, and that many distinguished gentlemen had held the Office. But the Committee ought, at all events, to recollect this—that within their own experience there had been a period within which the Judge Advocate General had not been required at all; that there was a time during which the Office was allowed to remain in abeyance. They remembered that the late Sir Colman O'Loughlen retired from that Office, and that for some months there was no successor appointed. At length, however, it became convenient for the Minister of the day to appoint to the Office a right hon. and learned Gentleman, who had been removed from one position, but whom it was desirable to retain in the Public Service. It appeared to him (Mr. Rylands) that when they were voting this £2,000, the Committee was entitled to know what were the duties and powers of the Judge Advocate General. It seemed possible for the Office always to remain in abeyance; or, at all events, for its duties to be performed by the Deputy Judge Advocate General and the other gentle-year or not. But, at present, the Committee was in a state of complete mystification; and unless the right hon. and learned Gentleman would condescend to explain what were his duties, they could only assume that he was in a state of mystification himself regarding them.

Sir Alexander Gordon

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK thought that the hon. Member who had spoken last (Mr. Callan) could not have been in his place during the whole of the discussion, or he would have heard the explanation that he had asked for, given at least three or four times, to the Committee. The principal duties of the Office which he had the honour to hold were to act as a Court of Review over all the district and general courts martial that were held elsewhere than in India; and he had, besides, to advise Her Majesty as to the confirmation of the findings of all general courts martial held on officers or soldiers. These were responsible duties in the highest degree. He had also to advise upon the construction of the Mutiny Act as far as related to criminal matters. The jurisdiction in matters arising out of the Mutiny Act not criminal belonged to the authorities at the War Office. It was also his duty to peruse the proceedings of every general and district court martial which came before him. In that work he was assisted by a deputy, who was a civilian, and by three other able officers. Two of those were not appointed by himself. One of them distinguished himself greatly by his knowledge of the subject before the Committee last year; and the third, and last appointed, was not only a Colonel in the Army, but he was also a barrister. That was, surely, a good guarantee that the duties of this Office were properly discharged. The hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) had remarked that he gained his Office as a reward for obstruction, and he could only reply that when the hon. Member could say that he had obtained an Office of that quality, as a reward for his Parliamentary services, he should be very glad to see the day.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE pointed out that while the right hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Colonel Stanley) had said that the Commander-in-Chief never overruled the decision of the Judge Advocate General, the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) had given an instance where that had been done. It might often suit the financial arrangements of the War Office to do that; for if a purchasing officer were tried, they might set aside the verdict, and so confiscate his money. He should take a Division, unless a satisfactory reply were given.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT observed, that he had taken no part in that debate, because it seemed to him a great many of the questions raised might more properly be discussed in Committee on the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill. They could not, in Committee of Supply, alter the functions of the Judge Advocate General. He was not at all prepared to say that it would not be a good thing, in many respects, to alter the Office, as he understood the Judge Advocate General was not really a Judge at all; but he was an assessor to the military authorities, advising them upon the legality of any transactions which might have taken place at courts martial. Of course, that decision was not binding, any more than a decision of any assessor would be binding. The Judge Advocate General stood to the War Office, in fact, exactly in the same position that the Law Officers of the Crown did to Her Majesty's Government. They were generally guided by their opinion, and they would incur a very great responsibility if they departed from that advice; yet, if they chose, they were at liberty to do so. In the same way, the military authorities were at liberty to pass over the advice of the Judge Advocate General. He did think at one time that the law should be altered, and that the decision of the Judge Advocate General should be binding; but he withdrew that opinion, in consequence of the argument, which he thought an admirable one, that to do so would be to destroy the responsibility of the military authorities. At present, if they took any course which was unjustifiable, the House could call them to account; but if they could shelter themselves behind the decision of the Judge Advocate General, and could say they had no power to over-rule his decision, then the highest military authorities would be able to impose this authority of the Judge Advocate General between themselves and the country. With regard to the Vote, he had not heard anybody suggest that the duties of the Office position of that official raised very considerably. It was a position of vital importance to the discipline of the Army. Whether it really was so or not, he considered it should be a judicial position; that the Judge Advocate General should occupy the position of an acting Judge, and who should be perfectly independent of Party or of politics, and not be removable in consequence of a change of Government. Such an officer should be selected from amongst the best known barristers of the day, who had had great experience in Criminal Law. His deputy, also, should be selected very much for the same reason. Indifferent lawyers and briefless barristers appointed to the Judge Advocate's Department had, from time to time, done infinite mischief as regarded discipline and military law. He considered that in the Judge Advocate General's Department there ought to be a considerably greater military element than now existed. They ought to have in the Department officers of considerable regimental experience, and men whose specialité had been courts martial. There were such men in every regiment, and they should be selected for this Department by a strong test examination. In his opinion, there ought also to be a strong and closer connection between, at all events, the military element of the Judge Advocate General's Department and the Adjutant General's Department at the Horse Guards. A Commander-in-Chief might now be really and totally ignorant of the decision of the Judge Advocate General, and might himself give orders entirely contrary to what had been ruled by the Judge Advocate General to the General Officer commanding a division, and the Committee would agree with him that such a state of affairs was not desirable. He could quote so many instances where the Judge Advocate General's Department, apart from political reasons and sometimes from positive ignorance, had given very incorrect decisions, that he contended the Department ought to be thoroughly reformed and specially so organized as to be above political interest. He could remember a Judge Advocate General, who was a Liberal, standing for a borough at a General Election for re-election, and he was very nearly beaten, and lost 40 or 50 votes entirely by the other Party condescending to get up a cry that he had advocated what they untruthfully called "branding" with B.C. He (General Shute) was sure the Committee would agree with him that an officer who was almost a Judge should be independent of that sort of cry. He knew the majority of the House were very much opposed to anything like marking; but he was satisfied it was the only way in which they should get over the great difficulty with regard to desertion and fraudulent re-enlistment. Marking with the letters "B. C." was not done in the least as a military punishment, and it was done with as little pain as possible by merely tattooing. Officers on courts martial often used to very much object to marking men of previously fair character with the letter "D;" but when a court martial did not make this a part of its sentence for desertion, the President was ordered to append a letter to the proceedings explaining the reason for the omission, so great an object was it in those days considered by the War Department to, by this means, protect the taxpaying public from fraud. In the same way, with regard to "B. C.," he did not see how they could possibly improve the Army if, whenever they got rid of a blackguard out of one regiment, they were not able to mark him, so that he might be prevented from enlisting in another corps.

General Shute

THE CHAIRMAN said, he thought the hon. and gallant Member was now wandering from the subject before the Committee.

GENERAL SHUTE said, his object was to show that the Judge Advocate General, to whose election he had referred, was perfectly right in advocating marking, and yet he very nearly lost his seat by it. If the late Mr. Butt were still in the House, he would know of a case which occurred in Cork—a case of a court martial on Fenian prisoners. One of them would be remembered by some hon. Members present as Sergeant Darrah. Two non-commissioned officers were tried for cases of most outrageous mutiny. Both were sentenced to death; but the proceedings of the first court martial were quashed, and the prisoner returned to his duty, because the Judge Advocate General decided that the evidence was contrary to law, showing either utter ignorance of the law of evidence as regards co-conspirators, or, as some thought, fear of his constituents.

tify that the policeman in question was entitled to the reward, and that had to be countersigned by the commanding officer of the battalion.

COLONEL STANLEY quite agreed that this item required very carefully watching. Last year, the amount was exceptionally high, because there were an unusual number of enlistments, and he was sorry to say the ratio of desertion followed that of enlistment. He knew that in the past there was certainly some ground for suspecting collusion; but he did not believe it existed at all now. He hoped next year they would find a falling off in this item.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(3.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £266,200, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for Medical Establishments and Services, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880."

LORD ELCHO said, there were two points connected with the Vote to which he wished to call attention. One, with reference to the health of our troops in India; and the other, as to the provision made for the sick and wounded in South Africa. His attention had been drawn to the first subject by Lieutenant General Lord Mark Kerr, who thought it was not conducive to the health of the troops that the same hours for meals should be kept in India as in England. At present they got their dinners in the middle of the day, and the result was that the troops suffered a good deal, and there was great loss of life. Lord Mark Kerr said that when he altered the hours of meals, he found the men much better in health than under the old system. This, however, being a new practice, objections were raised, and he was ordered to discontinue it. He brought the matter before the authorities in England, and a Correspondence ensued on the subject, which His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge marked as a matter of grave moment. He (Lord Elcho) was anxious to get copies of this Correspondence, for the matter seriously affected our troops; but there was great difficulty in doing so. There was no record of this Correspondence at the War Office, although marked as of grave importance by the Commander-in-Chief. It had been sent out to India, it was said, nine months ago; but now that the attention of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had been drawn to this matter, he hoped he would take care that the question was not allowed to drop. He hoped, also, that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would see if it was right that the change should be made. As to the second point, rightly or wrongly, an impression appeared to prevail that, so far as the Government was concerned, sufficient provision had not been made for the sick and wounded in South Africa. It was believed that the provision was inadequate, and that the supply of doctors and of medical stores was insufficient, and that nurses were wanted. If that was the case, it was a very serious question, and told very badly for the administration of the War Office. It was incredible, after the sums of money that had been voted, that our soldiers should be in the state described. Committees had been formed by ladies and gentlemen, at the head of which were persons of both sexes, who had shown on many occasions their zeal and kindly feeling; among them being Lady Burdett Coutts and the Duke of Sutherland, who were exerting themselves in the matter to do what ought to have been done by the Government. At the church which he attended, the day before, the preacher asked them to subscribe double, not only for the hospitals, but also to enable him to send aid for the benefit of our sick and wounded soldiers in South Africa. It was discreditable to the Government, and to all concerned, if they were in such a state, that, at the commencement of a war with a small nation of savages, these committees should be required, and that there should be these collections for their soldiers in their churches. Such a thing should not be necessary, and it did not reflect credit upon the Government for their administration. He was inclined to believe, however, that they were ill-informed, and that stores did abound. He had seen a statement, as he supposed, in the nature of a communiqué, which stated that not only were the stores fully sufficient, but that the amusement and comforts of the soldiers had been attended to. Of course, everyone would be willing to give subscriptions, if needed; but if they were not necessary, they would only look foolish in the eyes of Europe, if they were thus to ask for private aid.

actions; and if he were to venture to make a suggestion, it would be that in any re-organization of the Office it should be made independent of the Horse Guards' Staff. He thought that would be taken as a boon to the Army, in having men who were independent of His Royal Highness and the Horse Guards' Staff. There were cases of very great difficulty arising from time to time, and by strengthening the Office he thought improved results might be attained in the administration of military justice.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER was not surprised that the hon. and gallant Member for Leitrim (Major O'Beirne) had called attention to the subject, simply on the ground that the Office was not efficiently administered. In the first place, there was constituted something like a civil tribunal; but then, if the Commander-in-Chief had the power of setting aside the decisions of that tribunal, the House of Commons, in assenting to that proceeding, was really stultifying itself. They must either improve the position of the Judge Advocate General, and render it more authoritative and efficient, or they must restrict, to some extent, the position of the Commander-in-Chief. That had been proved by professional testimony in the speech of the hon. and gallant Member for Brighton (General Shute), who cited a case where the Judge Advocate General set aside the decision of a court martial; but, notwithstanding that, the Commander-in-Chief of the Irish Forces, who was in the neighbourhood of Dublin Castle, and was probably subject to political influences, set aside the decision of the Judge Advocate General, and thus the whole affair was placed in a state of confusion. [General SHUTE dissented.] Well, the hon. and gallant Gentleman (General Shute) shook his head at that statement, and he (Mr. O'Connor Power) was sorry if he had misapprehended the hon. and gallant Gentleman. He understood the hon. and gallant Gentleman, in one part of his speech, to refer to the case of Sergeant Darrah and others who were tried on a particular charge. No doubt, accusations of a very dreadful nature were brought against them; but he should say, from a study of the subject, that the most disgraceful part of the business was sending soldiers to long terms of imprisonment for alleged political offences. If anything could be done by the Judge Advocate General's Office towards independent control over those tribunals, some good would have been accomplished; but, in his opinion, the root of the evil had not been touched up to this point. He believed that the dissatisfaction which the decisions of courts martial generally give rise to arose from the fact that the prisoner who was tried before them was not represented by counsel, in the same way as if he were tried before a Civil Court for a civil offence. There could be no doubt that the common soldier standing his trial for any offence in the Army was in a very disadvantageous position compared to that of the criminal who was brought before a civil tribunal; and until the law was so altered as to give facilities to the military prisoner as regarded cross-examination of witnesses and legal defence in every shape and form, they might expect to find that these decisions, when they came to be reviewed, were of a very doubtful and ambiguous character. This Vote called upon the Committee to make certain provision for military prisons; and he should like to know whether the treatment which military prisoners received in times of political excitement in England and in Ireland was a subject to which the Judge Advocate General had devoted any attention? All these questions of military law and punishment were at the very root of the strength and efficiency of the Army, and great complaints were frequently made of the manner in which military offences had been punished in times of political excitement. Instead of abolishing the Office of Judge Advocate General, he thought they should endeavour to secure the services of someone who was well posted in military law. It ought also to be a permanent Office, and the holder of it should not be liable to be changed by the incoming or the outgoing of any political Party. Still, at the same time, it should remain under the control of the people's Representatives in that House; for although the Office might be held permanently by one Gentleman, his acts, as a subordinate of the Government, would, of course, be subject to the examination and control of Parliament. Well, an attempt had been made to describe the Judge Advocate General as he at present existed; and he thought

Sir Patrick O'Brien

Staff. That must be received as evidence of very considerable weight, and he saw no reason to apprehend that the hospital arrangements would be found insufficient for the requirements of the Service. He hoped the Committee would allow him to point out in how very difficult and delicate a position he was placed. On the one hand, no demands had been made for further aid; and, on the other hand, he was extremely averse to stand forward, either officially or otherwise, between a very natural, kind-hearted and spontaneous desire in the country to render aid. Nobody, of course, was so well off but that they could afford to be better off; and, no doubt, from this feeling, people were anxious to do all that lay in their power, in the hope of giving some assistance and of rendering some relief, although there was no positive want. His hon. and gallant Friend near him (Colonel Loyd Lindsay), the Chairman of the National Aid Society, had been good enough to inform him that he had sent out a credit of a considerable amount to an officer of experience, who was one of the Commissariat in Africa, and had exerted himself in similar ways in other countries; that that officer had drawn upon the fund to a very small amount indeed; and the purposes for which he had drawn upon it had been to provide comforts which some people would call luxurious, such as tobacco, and things of that sort, for the men. That all seemed to him to point to the fact that, at the present time, the medical wants were fairly supplied, and even more than fairly supplied. He could not say that at some particular places on the line of march, or out of it, that there were not some cases of need. They did not expect to find a whole chemist's shop in the Highlands. The difficulty had simply, therefore, been one of transport; and, as far as he could understand, wherever it was possible hospitals had been established and medical comforts had been provided, which had proved fully sufficient. If he were aware of anything to the contrary, by accident or otherwise, it would be his duty at once to make it known to the House. At the present time, however, he believed that that was not at all so. Although a considerable quantity of stores went down in the steamship Clyde, and were lost, yet immediately that was known in this country, and without waiting for transport, steps were taken to send out supplies by the mail boats, as fast as was possible. It would be of interest to the Committee that they should know exactly the number of men on the spot. At the present moment, in the Medical Department proper, there were 58 officers at the Cape, 7 on the passage, and 13 under orders. Of the Naval Medical Department—present, 4; on passage, 2. Several surgeons, exclusive of those employed locally—38 present and 2 on passage. Army Hospital Corps, 8 present and 1 on passage. Non-commissioned officers, 275 present and 108 on passage. He might add that within the last few days, though no demand had been made upon him, he had thought it advisable to place under orders 1 lady superintendent and 6 nurses attached to the hospital at home, which was in addition to any medical aid afforded by private enterprise in the Cape. He believed that no Army in the field had ever had its medical wants so far met in proportion to its strength; and he felt sure the Committee would have confidence that if any further medical demands were made they would be met to the best of their power. With regard to the Medical Department, he was sorry to say that, even at this period of the year, he was not able to speak with entire certainty. These matters of revising the conditions of service were always matters of considerable delay; but, speaking generally, he might say that, provided he could obtain the assent of his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and of his hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, it was his intention, as far as possible, to carry out the recommendations made by the Committee appointed by his Predecessor, as to the pay and the status of the medical officers. It was, for obvious reasons, not very expedient to deal with details at that moment; and he did not apprehend that it was entirely a matter upon which it would be wise to lay down abstract principles. But there was one point which had given him and those who acted with him, and for whose assistance he was deeply obliged, very considerable difficulty. That was a recommendation which he feared had given rise to a good deal of misapprehension—that certain medical bodies should have the power of nominating candidates for the medical service. It was

Ministry who was either too able or too ornamental for any other position on the Treasury Bench. Occasionally they had men of ability in the Office; but, in face of the circumstances narrated by the hon. and gallant Member for Brighton, he would ask whether some change was not necessary? They now had it, on the authority of that hon. and gallant Member, that a man was sentenced to death by a court martial on proceedings which the then Lord Advocate (Sir Colman O'Loughlen) declared to be illegal. Notwithstanding that opinion from a man whose high legal ability certainly entitled him to sit upon the Bench, it was over-ruled in a moment of intense political excitement by the authorities in Dublin, and the man was sentenced to imprisonment for life. Perhaps the Judge Advocate General would be able to tell them whether this was the man who died in prison? The gentleman filling this post should be a man eminent for legal ability, who would hold a firm hand over the military authorities whose opinion he might have to set aside, and a person whose opinion would carry immense moral, as well as official, weight. Of course, the authorities would snap their fingers at an ornamental Judge Advocate, and would not care what he advised. With regard to the forms of courts martial, it was an anomaly too painful to be permitted to continue, that cross-examination, even in cases where a man was on trial for his life, should be conducted in this old-fashioned and wasteful way. He would appeal to the legal Gentlemen in the Committee whether it would be possible to shake the testimony of any man in cross-examination, when every answer had to be written, and so he had time given him to think over his replies.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE begged to point out that he had received no reply to his question, as to whether the Commander-in-Chief had power to set aside the opinion of the Judge Advocate General. That was his main objection to this appointment, and that point had been evaded.

COLONEL STANLEY replied, that he had no absolute power in himself to set aside the decisions of the Judge Advocate General, although, of course, it might happen that in matters relating to the Prerogative of the Crown, and not appertaining to proceedings arising out of courts martial, the decision might not be in accord with the views of the Judge Advocate General. With regard to the forms of the procedure of courts martial, it seemed to him that the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Major Nolan) was mistaken when he said that no part of the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill dealt with this subject. Clause 69 laid down the rules of procedure, and gave the Secretary of State for War power to make rules, and so on. These rules had to be laid on the Table of the House, and they would be treated in the same manner as the judicial rules. With regard to taking down the evidence by a shorthand writer, it was much more easy to agree with the proposition than to carry it out. In the first place, in a very great number of courts martial there was no cross-examination at all, as the prisoner did not desire any opening for cross-examination. It was impossible to assimilate the proceedings of courts martial to those of ordinary Law Courts. For instance, when a prisoner pleaded guilty, proceedings were easily stopped in a Civil Court, while that could not be the case in a court martial, because a prisoner might sometimes plead guilty of an offence he had never committed, in order to get sentenced to a certain punishment. It was, therefore, necessary to go through all the forms of a court martial. It must be remembered also, with regard to a shorthand writer, there were practical difficulties in the way. No doubt, such assistance was of considerable value, and there was a good deal in the suggestion; but, at the same time, it would entail considerable expense, and there would, of course, be considerable difficulty in arranging the details. Summing up what had been said during the debate, it appeared there was a certain current of feeling, with which he could not sympathize, in favour of making this tribunal independent of the military authorities; but that was a very different thing from condemning the whole system at present connected with that Office. All wished, of course, to see that tribunal made as strong as possible. His right hon. and learned Friend had examined very carefully, and in a very independent manner, all decisions on matters of military law, and he reported upon them. These reports did not cause any conflict with the military authorities; but, on the contrary, were productive of great advantage to the Service.

Mr. Sullivan

MR. RYLANDS thought the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had clearly evaded the point which had been put by the hon. and gallant Member (Major O'Beirne). A distinct question had been asked. Could the Judge Advocate maintain the authority of his decisions? The reply was, that the Commander-in-Chief could no doubt disallow his decisions. The question was—had his decisions any legal force whatever? When they talked about the Office as a Court of Review, the question was, whether it was a Court with any power of maintaining its decisions? The question was, whether this Office of Judge Advocate General was not merely that of an assessor, who gave an opinion, but had no power to enforce it? He thought they were entitled to inquire into a matter of this kind, for, surely, when they paid a salary, they ought to be sure that the Office was something more than a name, and the officer something more than an assessor. They would vote this money with much more satisfaction, if they had reason to believe that steps would be taken to give the Office more authority. He quite agreed that it was very desirable that the post should be held by a barrister of high authority, because then they would be certain that justice would be given where it was not now always given.

MR. CALLAN had listened to the debate for some time; but he was even now in great difficulty as to what were the duties of the Judge Advocate General. Surely, as that right hon. and learned Gentleman was present, they ought to have, and it was most desirable they should have, an explanation from him, as to his powers and authorities. As a mere matter of respect, he should explain to the Committee what were the powers and authorities of the office, before they were asked to vote this sum of £2,000 as a salary.

MAJOR NOLAN pointed out that even now they did not know who was responsible for these forms. Was it the Secretary of State for War, or the judicial department, or the military department? Of course, as had been pointed out, it was sometimes necessary to go into the circumstances of the case, even where the prisoner pleaded guilty; but in the several cases to which he had referred that always could be done, if necessary. What he complained of was that the courts martial were obliged to try out a case, even when a man pleaded guilty where he was obviously guilty, and where, accordingly, much time was wasted in the procedure. He would suggest that some plan might be found for shortening this procedure. They might have shorthand writers in some cases, and where that was not possible, then they could follow the old plan. At present, it was necessary to put down every bit of evidence, even when no one desired it. People seemed to think that officers' time was of no value, and that, therefore, all this rubbish should be stuck down, when a slight change might save a great deal of work. For his part, he had never known anyone having experience on the subject who did not think that these proceedings might be shortened with great advantage.

COLONEL ALEXANDER remarked, that the procedure had been shortened a good deal of late by the adoption of printed forms, and he thought something more might be done in that direction. As to cases where a man pleaded guilty, he had known one where the prisoner was afterwards asked if he had anything to say, and his statement showed that he was not guilty.

COLONEL COLTHURST agreed that it would be very undesirable not to record the proceedings where men pleaded guilty, for he had known a case also where a man pleaded guilty, and afterwards made a long statement which showed that he always meant to plead not guilty.

MR. SULLIVAN would like to ask the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Brighton (General Shute), whether he correctly understood him to say that the decision of Sir Colman O'Loughlen, in the case of Sergeant Darrah, was overruled by the Commander-in-Chief?

GENERAL SHUTE replied that he never said anything of the kind.

MR. PARNELL thought it would be very satisfactory if the hon. and gallant General, in such circumstances, would inform the Committee what he actually did say. He (Mr. Parnell) listened very attentively to his statement. It was true that he did not mention the name of Sir Colman O'Loughlen; but he stated that the Judge Advocate General in Ireland, at the time of the trial of Sergeant Darrah, decided that the evidence at the trial was illegal, and directed that the proceedings should be quashed; and that the Commander-in-Chief came to a different conclusion, and prevented the proceedings from being so quashed. It seemed rather difficult to discover what were the duties and functions of the Judge Advocate General. The Office seemed to him very much in the nature of a sinecure, and it would be very desirable if the functions of that Office could be defined and protected from the Commander-in-Chief or the War Office. There seemed to be considerable doubt even in the mind of the Secretary of State for War on the question, whether the Judge Advocate General could be interfered with by the Commander-in-Chief; and it would, therefore, be very satisfactory if he would introduce some Amendment which would carry out the views of the Committee, that the authority of the Judge Advocate General should be protected from interference. It was suggested that the present holder of the Office received it as a reward for his energetic obstruction of the Irish Church Act, the Irish Land Act, and the Ballot Act. The right hon. and learned Gentleman was certainly very energetic in opposing those measures; but, although obstruction was a very high function, which ought to be protected in every way, it did not necessarily entitle the person who exercised it to an Office when his Party came into power.

Mr. O'CONNOR POWER thought the question could not be left where it was now, and he was very strongly inclined to support the appeal made to the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Brighton. He certainly understood the hon. and gallant General to refer to a conflict of opinions between the Judge Advocate General and the Commander-in-Chief of the Forces in Ireland; and if that was not what he intended to convey, he should like to hear anyone in the House, except himself, explain exactly what it was he did intend to say. He was also anxious to have some further explanation about this Office, because the Secretary of State for War seemed to have no definite idea of the respective powers of the Judge Advocate General and the Commander-in-Chief. It seemed that when there was a conflict of opinion between them, the Commander-in-Chief had power to set aside the decision of the Judge Advocate General.

MAJOR NOLAN really thought he was entitled to an answer as to the forms of these courts martial. It was a substantial point, and while the answer was of importance it might be very easily given. If the Secretary of State for War acknowledged his responsibility, they would know who was responsible for them; but, at the present time, it was very uncertain who drew up these forms, and who enforced them.

COLONEL STANLEY replied, that the hon. and gallant Member certainly should know who was responsible for these forms, inasmuch as they appeared in the Queen's Regulations, signed by the Adjutant General. They could scarcely tell whether precisely the same policy would obtain in the future, because these rules would now for the first time be laid on the Table. As to the position of the Judge Advocate General, his decisions could be technically overruled; but, practically, they never were.

Mr. CALLAN thought, when a question had been put, it certainly should be answered by the person to whom it was addressed. He remembered the House for 10 years, and when he first came into it, he had a high respect for the Office of Judge Advocate General, which had been filled by several able men, such as Mr. Stuart Wortley, Mr. Headlam, and then, in 1868, by Sir Colman O'Loughlen, who was always ready to stand between offenders tried at a court martial and the Horse Guards. When he resigned, the Office was filled by one of the most eminent members of the Northern Circuit until the present Government appointed the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) to that post. He supposed that he was appointed because of his conversational qualities, for in that House he had never heard any statement by him showing his legal ability. The country required that the Office should be filled by one who was competent at least to explain to the Committee what were the powers and authorities he possessed, more especially when the Vote under discussion was whether they should vote him £2,000 a year or not. But, at present, the Committee was in a state of complete mystification; and unless the right hon. and learned Gentleman would condescend to explain what were his duties, they could only assume that he was in a state of mystification himself regarding them.

Mr. Parnell

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK thought that the hon. Member who had spoken last (Mr. Callan) could not have been in his place during the whole of the discussion, or he would have heard the explanation that he had asked for, given at least three or four times, to the Committee. The principal duties of the Office which he had the honour to hold were to act as a Court of Review over all the district and general courts martial that were held elsewhere than in India; and he had, besides, to advise Her Majesty as to the confirmation of the findings of all general courts martial held on officers or soldiers. These were responsible duties in the highest degree. He had also to advise upon the construction of the Mutiny Act as far as related to criminal matters. The jurisdiction in matters arising out of the Mutiny Act not criminal belonged to the authorities at the War Office. It was also his duty to peruse the proceedings of every general and district court martial which came before him. In that work he was assisted by a deputy, who was a civilian, and by three other able officers. Two of those were not appointed by himself. One of them distinguished himself greatly by his knowledge of the subject before the Committee last year; and the third, and last appointed, was not only a Colonel in the Army, but he was also a barrister. That was, surely, a good guarantee that the duties of this Office were properly discharged. The hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) had remarked that he gained his Office as a reward for obstruction, and he could only reply that when the hon. Member could say that he had obtained an Office of that quality, as a reward for his Parliamentary services, he should be very glad to see the day.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE pointed out that while the right hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Colonel Stanley) had said that the Commander-in-Chief never overruled the decision of the Judge Advocate General, the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) had given an instance where that had been done. It might often suit the financial arrangements of the War Office to do that; for if a purchasing officer were tried, they might set aside the verdict, and so confiscate his money. He should take a Division, unless a satisfactory reply were given.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT observed, that he had taken no part in that debate, because it seemed to him a great many of the questions raised might more properly be discussed in Committee on the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill. They could not, in Committee of Supply, alter the functions of the Judge Advocate General. He was not at all prepared to say that it would not be a good thing, in many respects, to alter the Office, as he understood the Judge Advocate General was not really a Judge at all; but he was an assessor to the military authorities, advising them upon the legality of any transactions which might have taken place at courts martial. Of course, that decision was not binding, any more than a decision of any assessor would be binding. The Judge Advocate General stood to the War Office, in fact, exactly in the same position that the Law Officers of the Crown did to Her Majesty's Government. They were generally guided by their opinion, and they would incur a very great responsibility if they departed from that advice; yet, if they chose, they were at liberty to do so. In the same way, the military authorities were at liberty to pass over the advice of the Judge Advocate General. He did think at one time that the law should be altered, and that the decision of the Judge Advocate General should be binding; but he withdrew that opinion, in consequence of the argument, which he thought an admirable one, that to do so would be to destroy the responsibility of the military authorities. At present, if they took any course which was unjustifiable, the House could call them to account; but if they could shelter themselves behind the decision of the Judge Advocate General, and could say they had no power to over-rule his decision, then the highest military authorities would be able to impose this authority of the Judge Advocate General between themselves and the country. With regard to the Vote, he had not heard anybody suggest that the duties of the Office were not discharged well and thoroughly. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had advised the military authorities for some years, and they had never heard that his advice was not sound and right. Therefore, under such circumstances, he thought it would be far more convenient to discuss these suggestions for alterations in Committee on the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill, and to proceed with their work so far as this Vote was concerned.

MR. SULLIVAN considered that this was the first time that they had heard any real explanation of the duties of the Office; and it was sufficient, in his opinion, to justify his hon. and gallant Friend (Major O'Beirne) in not taking a Division.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE desired to withdraw his opposition, now that the proper explanation had been given them of the duties of the Office, although he had had to wait a very considerable time for the explanation.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, the Committee had received an explanation which he could assure them was not correct. The hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) was under the impression that the Judge Advocate General was only the adviser of the military authorities, and that they could take his advice or not as they thought proper. That was a mistake. The Judge Advocate General was responsible for the legal part of all general courts martial. He took the Sovereign's pleasure himself upon that point, and if he advised the Sovereign that a court martial was illegal, the military authorities could take no action. He was not simply the legal authority of the military authorities; but he was the Legal Adviser of the Sovereign, and in direct personal communication with her.

MR. CALLAN thought they were worse off than ever, for they had had a lengthy explanation from most of the ablest lawyers in the House, and then they were assured by one of the most experienced military Members of the Committee that that explanation was not correct. All he could say was that if the Judge Advocate General was merely a legal assessor, it was the dearest Office to the country, and the best paid one in Her Majesty's Service.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Sir William Harcourt

MR. PARNELL wished to bring one or two small points under the attention of the Secretary of State for War. Under sub-head B, the payment of acting Judge Advocate in the Colonies last year was only £20, this year the amount was £50. Then, again, the Colonial charges were £130; while this year they were only £100. This appeared to him to indicate some looseness in drawing the Estimates.

COLONEL STANLEY explained that in dealing with many portions of the Estimates, when the amounts fluctuated, they had to be guided by the experience of the past, and that was the explanation of the difference in this case.

MR. PARNELL pointed out that the rewards for the apprehension of deserters had risen very fast even compared with last year. There was an increase of 25 per cent, while there had also been a steady increase in the amounts for the last five or six years, and, in fact, ever since Mr. Cardwell's Government. In 1875-6 the amount was £1,800; in 1876-7 it was £2,000, in 1878-9 it was £3,000, and this year it was £4,000. He was afraid this indicated collusion in certain cases between the people who got the rewards and the deserters. The amount given was very large. They might have men committing desertion in order to obtain the reward.

MAJOR NOLAN did not believe that there was any collusion, as had been suggested; but still this item ought to be very carefully watched. He believed the police very often apprehended soldiers who were not deserters, but were simply absent without leave, in order to get the reward of a pound. Very often a man overstays his leave and deserved punishment; but would yet come back if he were not apprehended. But it was not merely a case of a reward to the police, for an expensive escort had to be sent to fetch the man, and they had besides, the trouble and expense of his trial.

COLONEL ALEXANDER also thought the item should be very carefully watched. A short time ago, when private soldiers were allowed to apprehend deserters, men used to agree to divide the reward, and the thing at last became so apparent that an Order was issued forbidding private soldiers to receive it. Now, a magistrate had to certify that the policeman in question was entitled to the reward, and that had to be countersigned by the commanding officer of the battalion.

COLONEL STANLEY quite agreed that this item required very carefully watching. Last year, the amount was exceptionally high, because there were an unusual number of enlistments, and he was sorry to say the ratio of desertion followed that of enlistment. He knew that in the past there was certainly some ground for suspecting collusion; but he did not believe it existed at all now. He hoped next year they would find a falling off in this item.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(3.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £266,200, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for Medical Establishments and Services, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880."

LORD ELCHO said, there were two points connected with the Vote to which he wished to call attention. One, with reference to the health of our troops in India; and the other, as to the provision made for the sick and wounded in South Africa. His attention had been drawn to the first subject by Lieutenant General Lord Mark Kerr, who thought it was not conducive to the health of the troops that the same hours for meals should be kept in India as in England. At present they got their dinners in the middle of the day, and the result was that the troops suffered a good deal, and there was great loss of life. Lord Mark Kerr said that when he altered the hours of meals, he found the men much better in health than under the old system. This, however, being a new practice, objections were raised, and he was ordered to discontinue it. He brought the matter before the authorities in England, and a Correspondence ensued on the subject, which His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge marked as a matter of grave moment. He (Lord Elcho) was anxious to get copies of this Correspondence, for the matter seriously affected our troops; but there was great difficulty in doing so. There was no record of this Correspondence at the War Office, although marked as of grave importance by the Commander-in-Chief. It had been sent out to India, it was said, nine months ago; but now that the attention of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had been drawn to this matter, he hoped he would take care that the question was not allowed to drop. He hoped, also, that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would see if it was right that the change should be made. As to the second point, rightly or wrongly, an impression appeared to prevail that, so far as the Government was concerned, sufficient provision had not been made for the sick and wounded in South Africa. It was believed that the provision was inadequate, and that the supply of doctors and of medical stores was insufficient, and that nurses were wanted. If that was the case, it was a very serious question, and told very badly for the administration of the War Office. It was incredible, after the sums of money that had been voted, that our soldiers should be in the state described. Committees had been formed by ladies and gentlemen, at the head of which were persons of both sexes, who had shown on many occasions their zeal and kindly feeling; among them being Lady Burdett Coutts and the Duke of Sutherland, who were exerting themselves in the matter to do what ought to have been done by the Government. At the church which he attended, the day before, the preacher asked them to subscribe double, not only for the hospitals, but also to enable him to send aid for the benefit of our sick and wounded soldiers in South Africa. It was discreditable to the Government, and to all concerned, if they were in such a state, that, at the commencement of a war with a small nation of savages, these committees should be required, and that there should be these collections for their soldiers in their churches. Such a thing should not be necessary, and it did not reflect credit upon the Government for their administration. He was inclined to believe, however, that they were ill-informed, and that stores did abound. He had seen a statement, as he supposed, in the nature of a communiqué, which stated that not only were the stores fully sufficient, but that the amusement and comforts of the soldiers had been attended to. Of course, everyone would be willing to give subscriptions, if needed; but if they were not necessary, they would only look foolish in the eyes of Europe, if they were thus to ask for private aid.

DR. LUSH hoped that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, in view of the difficulty of providing properly-qualified medical officers for the Army, would carefully consider the whole subject. Even at the present time, when we were engaged in a war of considerable dimensions, the number of surgeons who joined the Army in the year was absolutely less than it was last year; while, at the same time, the increase in the allowances had gone up from £11,000 to £19,000. He could only suppose that that arose from calling in the aid of civilians. It seemed to him that this was the proper time to press upon the right hon. and gallant Gentleman that he should consider the position of the medical officers in the Army, in order to induce a more free enlistment. He was well aware that there was a strong indisposition to enter Her Majesty's Service, and he earnestly trusted the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would do his best to provide properly-educated men for the Service.

MR. ONSLOW begged to state that he was nine months with a British regiment in Calcutta, and he never once heard either an officer or non-commissioned officer express a wish that the time of the meals should be changed. If they were altered to the evening instead of the middle of the day, how was it possible for the British soldier to get any exercise? Parades, after a late meal, were utterly impossible, and anybody who had any experience of India must know that it would be highly injurious for the British soldier to take violent exercise so soon after the dinner hour. It must be recollected that in the hot season, the evening was the only time during which out-door amusements could be prosecuted. He hoped his right hon. and gallant Friend would not accept the suggestion of the noble Lord, which he believed would be very detrimental to the Army in India.

LORD ELCHO replied, that the hon. Member had spoken on a matter of which he could have no knowledge as there had apparently been no trial of the change of system in the regiment to which he had referred. His (Lord Elcho's) statement rested on the experience of a General Officer who did make a change, and found, as a result, not only that the sick list greatly diminished, and that the regiments were more efficient, but that the men had ample time to perform their military duties.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he did not understand that the noble Lord intended to advise this change, but only to ask for the Correspondence on the matter between the authorities at home and in India, and to request that he should endeavour to hasten the printing and publication of the Correspondence on the subject. He had already verbally assured his noble Friend that he would do so. The Correspondence, a short time ago, was sent to India for certain observations, and he would have inquiries made about it. Then he was asked, with great justice, as to the provision for the sick at the Cape. All he could say was that though, undoubtedly, there was a certain amount of sickness, for the climate there, itself, was very bad—the heat during the day being great, and the cold by night great, which was always followed by a certain amount of climatic fever—still, from all he could hear, that fever was by no means severe, and, from the last Report, the percentage of sick was something approaching 5·76, which would be low even for this country. He gave the figures, however, with great caution, because they had to be corrected. But the inference to be drawn from them certainly was that the amount of sickness was by no means excessive. With regard to the wounded, there were, comparatively speaking, but a small number of them, and for various reasons there would most likely be a large number brought to the station hospitals. He was informed, however, that the hospital accommodation was far in excess of anything contemplated short of two or three general actions of very large dimensions. With regard to want of medical comforts, so far from that being the case, he was able to say, having a very large correspondence, both public and private, with officers at various parts of the field, that in only one case had he heard of any deficiency named, and that was one which would be remedied. On the Lower Tugela an extra allowance of quinine had been given out, and an apprehension existed that the supplies would run short, in consequence. The last Report he had received, however, stated that the hospitals were fully equipped, and expressly made no demand whatever for any further medical comforts, or for any addition to the

Staff. That must be received as evidence of very considerable weight, and he saw no reason to apprehend that the hospital arrangements would be found insufficient for the requirements of the Service. He hoped the Committee would allow him to point out in how very difficult and delicate a position he was placed. On the one hand, no demands had been made for further aid; and, on the other hand, he was extremely averse to stand forward, either officially or otherwise, between a very natural, kind-hearted and spontaneous desire in the country to render aid. Nobody, of course, was so well off but that they could afford to be better off; and, no doubt, from this feeling, people were anxious to do all that lay in their power, in the hope of giving some assistance and of rendering some relief, although there was no positive want. His hon. and gallant Friend near him (Colonel Loyd Lindsay), the Chairman of the National Aid Society, had been good enough to inform him that he had sent out a credit of a considerable amount to an officer of experience, who was one of the Commissariat in Africa, and had exerted himself in similar ways in other countries; that that officer had drawn upon the fund to a very small amount indeed; and the purposes for which he had drawn upon it had been to provide comforts which some people would call luxurious, such as tobacco, and things of that sort, for the men. That all seemed to him to point to the fact that, at the present time, the medical wants were fairly supplied, and even more than fairly supplied. He could not say that at some particular places on the line of march, or out of it, that there were not some cases of need. They did not expect to find a whole chemist's shop in the Highlands. The difficulty had simply, therefore, been one of transport; and, as far as he could understand, wherever it was possible hospitals had been established and medical comforts had been provided, which had proved fully sufficient. If he were aware of anything to the contrary, by accident or otherwise, it would be his duty at once to make it known to the House. At the present time, however, he believed that that was not at all so. Although a considerable quantity of stores went down in the steamship Clyde, and were lost, yet immediately that was known in this country, and without waiting for transport, steps were taken to send out supplies by the mail boats, as fast as was possible. It would be of interest to the Committee that they should know exactly the number of men on the spot. At the present moment, in the Medical Department proper, there were 58 officers at the Cape, 7 on the passage, and 13 under orders. Of the Naval Medical Department—present, 4; on passage, 2. Several surgeons, exclusive of those employed locally—38 present and 2 on passage. Army Hospital Corps, 8 present and 1 on passage. Non-commissioned officers, 275 present and 108 on passage. He might add that within the last few days, though no demand had been made upon him, he had thought it advisable to place under orders 1 lady superintendent and 6 nurses attached to the hospital at home, which was in addition to any medical aid afforded by private enterprise in the Cape. He believed that no Army in the field had ever had its medical wants so far met in proportion to its strength; and he felt sure the Committee would have confidence that if any further medical demands were made they would be met to the best of their power. With regard to the Medical Department, he was sorry to say that, even at this period of the year, he was not able to speak with entire certainty. These matters of revising the conditions of service were always matters of considerable delay; but, speaking generally, he might say that, provided he could obtain the assent of his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and of his hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, it was his intention, as far as possible, to carry out the recommendations made by the Committee appointed by his Predecessor, as to the pay and the status of the medical officers. It was, for obvious reasons, not very expedient to deal with details at that moment; and he did not apprehend that it was entirely a matter upon which it would be wise to lay down abstract principles. But there was one point which had given him and those who acted with him, and for whose assistance he was deeply obliged, very considerable difficulty. That was a recommendation which he feared had given rise to a good deal of misapprehension—that certain medical bodies should have the power of nominating candidates for the medical service. It was suggested that vacancies which had arisen should be filled, as to one-half, from qualified candidates, to be proposed by the Governing Bodies of the various Schools of Medicine in the United Kingdom and in the Colonies. And it was proposed that the candidates so nominated should have certificates from the body nominating them, according to a standard to be laid down by the Secretary of State for War, and approved by the Director of the Medical Department. It would be necessary, in such a case, to fix the order of precedence and the proportion in which the several Schools of Medicine should be offered nominations. He was afraid that that proposition—made with very good intentions, and one which, in his opinion, had much to recommend it—was received somewhat unkindly on its appearance in the world. It was said to be a reversion to the system of nominations, and the Government were charged with departing from the principle of competition. But he must point out that competition ceased when there were not enough competitors for the vacancies; while, on the other hand, there seemed to be very much to encourage him to believe that it would be wise to endeavour to enlist on their behalf the sympathy of the Schools of Medicine. They might help the Government by selecting a certain number from their pupils who might wish to take to the Army as a profession for life; and he did think it was a proposal from which they would derive considerable advantage. He hoped to derive some help of this kind from the hon. Gentleman the Member for Salisbury (Dr. Lush) and his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Mr. Lyon Playfair). Those Gentlemen had been good enough to say that when the time arrived—as he now hoped it had arrived—that other matters should be disposed of, that they would be quite willing to confer with him on the subject. He hoped, from their great knowledge of the medical service outside, and from their acquaintance with the general condition of the Profession, to derive considerable advice and assistance. If this nomination system could be carried through, and it were used in the sense intended, it would be a matter of un-mixed benefit to the Army Medical Department, and in a certain sense, also, to the Colleges which had these nominations to assign. If, on the other hand, the scheme were not properly taken up, the arrangements would certainly be exceedingly objectionable. He would not go into all the details of the question; but it certainly was a subject of great interest, and he was not sorry to have had that opportunity of explaining what action the Government were proposing to take.

Colonel Stanley

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, that notwithstanding the fact that this Vote had been reduced by the transfer of the sum of £9,700 for treatment of lunatics to Vote 23, the total amount of the present Estimate had increased by £9,653, an increase which arose from the additional payment of £9,898 to the Medical Department, and £9,480 for Militia surgeons and civilian medical practitioners. But, although he presumed that the number of medical officers had been increased proportionately, it was a remarkable circumstance that the amount of charge for the cost of medical stores remained precisely the same as it was in the previous year—namely, £23,000. On that ground, therefore, he could not understand why the salaries to medical officers should have been increased to the extent of £18,000, or thereabouts; and he trusted that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would be able to afford an explanation of the circumstances rendering necessary this additional charge. Again, he wished for some explanation as to why the amount of £9,700, charged for the treatment of lunatics in the Army, had this year increased to £17,200, as would be found to be the case by reference to Vote 23, page 123. The amount, according to the Estimates, had very nearly doubled since last year. He had never heard any reason why lunatics in the Army should have increased at such a rapid rate.

MR. PARNELL said, the method adopted by the War Office in transferring the charges for lunatics to Votes 19 and 23 was not in accordance with the recommendations of the Controller and Auditor General. As the Audit was a very recent institution, and was, to a certain extent, upon its trial, he thought it most important that the recommendations of the Controller and Auditor General should be carried out; and it would be very greatly to be regretted if the Audit were to be vitiated by failing to carry out those recommendations. It would be quite impossible for the Controller and Auditor General to audit the accounts unless the system proposed by him were followed. He saw, on page 30 of the Estimates, that the charge for military and civilian clerks and messengers, which last year stood at £1,716, was, in the present Estimate, only £732. Inasmuch as this charge, in his opinion, was almost of a fixed kind, he could not understand how the reduction had been brought about. While upon the subject of the Medical Vote, he might, perhaps, be permitted to refer to a matter which arose out of the last question which was before the House—namely, the treatment of the wounded in South Africa. The Committee, he was sure, had listened with a great deal of satisfaction to the assurance of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War that there was ample provision in South Africa for the treatment of the wounded. Although the subject was a painful and disagreeable one, he still felt it his duty to bring before the Committee that although in war it was always customary and usual to bring the wounded belonging to the enemy into hospital, and give them the same treatment as your own wounded, he had seen no instance during the war in South Africa in which the wounded enemy had been so treated. The number of wounded, however, must be very great; and he felt sure that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, if he had not already done so, would give directions that the Zulus should be treated as civilized enemies, and not as if they were savages: and that when taken prisoners they should be cared for as kindly as if they were our own soldiers.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER, referring to the opinion of a general officer of great eminence who had served in all parts of the world, that—

“If you wish to benefit the soldier, the attention of the War Office should be directed to rendering the condition of dental surgery in the Army more efficient; there is hardly anything from which a soldier suffers more than from the imperfect manner in which this is attended to both at home and abroad;”

said, he believed that during the last few years a certain number of medical officers had gone through a course of instruction in dental surgery. Although, of course, it was necessary that liver complaints should be attended to in India and elsewhere, yet a man could get on better with a tolerably bad liver than with unsound teeth—particularly considering the kind of food which soldiers had to eat—if these were unsound, there would be but imperfect assimilation. He would be glad to know whether any means whatever existed by which soldiers could get rid of their torments from toothache, or have them at least ameliorated?

COLONEL STANLEY was not aware that any complaint had been made in the Army with reference to the condition of dental surgery; but he would cause inquiry to be made into the matter. With reference to the remarks of the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell), he could not remember to have seen in any official document that mention was made of the Zulu wounded being treated in hospital. It was very well known that, in almost all circumstances, savage nations would contrive to carry off their wounded, and he fancied, therefore, it was owing to that circumstance that very few wounded had been under treatment in hospital. But he did remember having seen in another document that some sick Zulu prisoners had been brought to Fort Tenedos, and there treated precisely as were our own men. Whatever might be the faults of the British soldier, cruelty to prisoners could not be reckoned amongst them; and he felt sure that the wounded Zulus would receive every necessary attention which it was possible to afford them. It was, perhaps, another question whether they could be treated in hospital, because the duty of the surgeon would be to consider first the men of the British Service, after which the Zulus would, no doubt, be treated with all possible kindness and attention. With regard to the increased charge for pay, he had been very anxious to give effect, as far as possible, to some improvements suggested in the Army and Navy Services; and, therefore, with the concurrence of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he had taken a round sum for this purpose. The increase was partly accounted for in that way, and partly by having to meet the additional pay to which officers were entitled for active service under the Royal Warrant. With regard to the points raised by the hon. Member for Meath, it was, of course, very useful to have the criticism of the Controller and Auditor General, which he (Colonel Stanley) had never at any time opposed; and he thought that his advice, as in most other cases, would probably be followed in the present instance. Indeed, his directions were cordially accepted wherever matters of principle were involved.

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, the present Vote was one to which no exception could reasonably be taken, as the Medical Departments both in the Army and Navy were known to do their work fairly well. The hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) had found fault with the present Estimate because it appeared that more medicine was not given in the Army; but it appeared to him (Sir Andrew Lusk) that, perhaps, the less medicine given the better. The explanation of the Vote which had been given by the Secretary of State for War was, in his opinion, perfectly satisfactory.

MR. BIGGAR said, the explanation given by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War with regard to the treatment of Zulu prisoners was imperfect. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman had truly said that there was no official account of their having been attended to at all, which, although he had pointed out that some sick Zulus had been treated at Fort Tenedos, appeared very like a corroboration of the suspicion that all the Zulu wounded were killed in cold blood, by authority of the officers in command. Of course, he did not say that such was the case; but it looked suspicious. He joined issue with the right hon. and gallant Gentleman upon the statement that British officers had never been charged with cruelty to their enemies. He thought it was not very long ago that it appeared in one of the morning papers—and he, of course, referred to the circumstance as being subject to correction by the soldiers and officers at the place whence this information came—that a number of Afghan prisoners had been shot in cold blood.

THE CHAIRMAN drew the attention of the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) to the fact that the Committee were now discussing the Vote with reference to the medical establishment of the Army.

MR. BIGGAR said, he was simply replying to the statement made by the Secretary of State for War, that no charge of cruelty had ever been made against British officers and soldiers. To that statement he (Mr. Biggar) answered by producing a case in point, where such a charge had been made, and up to the present time had never been contradicted. He was about to add that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman should give the subject a little further consideration, and at once send out instructions to South Africa that the Zulu wounded should have as fair treatment as was customary amongst civilized nations in dealing with their enemies. Had the right hon. and gallant Gentleman said he would do so, his promise would have been sufficient; but he had confined his observations to saying that there was no evidence that the Zulus had been otherwise treated. He (Mr. Biggar) thought that the evidence was strong that they had not been treated as prisoners of war; and unless some promise was given that instructions for their treatment in this respect should be sent out, it would go forth to the world that England was not dealing with the Zulus in a civilized manner.

MR. MELDON, in rising to move the reduction of the Vote by £5,000, on account of the amount charged for the payment of Militia surgeons and allowances to civil medical practitioners, said, he should have been glad to make the sum a little more specific; but, unfortunately, the information necessary to enable him to do so had, for some reason or another, been withheld from the Estimates. He believed it would be found that £5,000 was the amount of the Vote taken for civil medical men employed in the Army Medical Department. For some years past most serious complaints had been made about the administration of the Army Medical Department; and the question raised was one which seriously affected the Medical Profession in Ireland, from which country a very much larger proportion of medical men entered the Service than from either England or Scotland. Unfortunately, owing to the very great maladministration of this Department, the Service had become exceedingly unpopular. The Motion upon this subject, of which he had given Notice early last Session, had been postponed on the understanding that a Committee was to be appointed to consider the best way of regulating the Army Medical Department; but since that time nothing substantial had been done, and no reform had taken place. The public were informed that the Committee had reported, and that their Report was about to be placed upon the Table of the House; but it was also understood that one of the Heads of the Department had chosen to set himself against the recommendations of the Committee. Upon this point the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would, perhaps, be able to state whether the fact was correctly stated. It was certainly the impression in Ireland that the necessary reforms had not taken place owing to the action of the Director General of the Army Medical Department, who appeared to be a stumbling-block in the way of improvement. There was the greatest anxiety in the Profession to enter the Service; but, owing to the way in which the Department was managed, it was, nevertheless, found necessary to employ large numbers of civilians to do the work which ought to be performed by Army medical officers. He had just been informed that no less a sum than £13,000 had been paid up to the present time for the services of medical men in the Colonies; and, considering how many men in the Medical Profession were ready and willing to enter the Service, such a state of things was most improper. Again, in the Irish garrison towns, there was a supply of civil medical men rendered necessary by the dearth of those employed in the Service. Such a state of things ought not to exist, for there was no lack of competent men ready to join the Service if only the Army Medical Department were properly administered. It was, as he had already pointed out, admitted last year that the Department required reform; but, notwithstanding that admission, they had, since that time, finished one war and were engaged in another, without anything having been done in this very important matter. Another question, which he believed had been advanced on Friday last, was as to the way in which Army medical men were treated who were forced to come home on account of ill-health. As he had already pointed out, a large number of civilian medical practitioners were being employed in Irish garrison towns; but while this system continued, there was also a large number of men invalided from foreign stations who were as perfectly competent to do the work in those places as any medical men who could be found. This question of the employment of medical officers invalided from foreign countries, who were still perfectly able to do their work, had been brought to his attention more than once. In the case of a medical officer invalided, he believed from Malta, it was intimated that he should continue his leave on half-pay, or withdraw from the Service. The officer in question, however, went before the Medical Board, and they reported that he was perfectly fit for any employment he could get at home, and that, when he got a little better, he could go abroad again; notwithstanding this, he was refused employment. On public and private grounds, therefore, he put it to the Secretary of State for War that these large sums of money should not be paid to civilians, while there were plenty of men invalided from abroad, who were perfectly able to do the work required. The practice was to give six months' sick leave to medical men invalided on foreign stations, who, if they did not choose to get well in that time, were actually forced out of the Service. By this system a great injury was done to the Public Service as well as to individuals; and the amount by which he moved the reduction of the present Vote was incurred by the very matters to which he had alluded. He, therefore, moved the reduction of the Vote by £5,000, on the assumption that that sum represented the amount paid to civilian medical men; but if it were shown that he was in error, he should be willing to move its reduction by the amount actually paid.

Colonel Stanley

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £261,200, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for Medical Establishments and Services, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880."—(Mr. Meldon.)

MR. PARNELL agreed with the hon. and learned Member for Kildare (Mr. Meldon) in thinking that medical officers of the Army had some reason to complain that their services were not availed of in places like the Colonies; and that, instead of this, large sums of money were voted for paying private medical practitioners in those places. He wished to direct the attention of the Committee to the fact that two years ago this item stood at only £500; that it had since risen to £5,840 last year, and then sprung to £13,805 in the present Estimate. These were certainly very remarkable jumps and changes in an item which he thought was, to a great extent, objectionable, and of which the medical officers in the Army were entitled to complain. Again, there was an increase in the Medical Department for the pay to surgeons general, deputy surgeons general, surgeons major, apothecaries and other medical officers, the amount under this head standing in the present Estimates at £196,000, as compared with £187,000 in those of last year; and he thought it would have been very much better if it had been made clear how much of this extra pay would go to the six surgeons general, and how much would go to the surgeons major, as well as other medical officers, so that the Committee might have been able to gauge the benefit likely to result to the working men of the Profession, and be certain that the amount was not spent in giving increases to men having already high salaries.

COLONEL STANLEY, in reply to the hon. and learned Member for Kildare (Mr. Meldon), regretted that the hon. and learned Gentleman had not been present at an earlier period of the Sitting, when he had stated that it was his intention to carry out, as far as possible, the recommendations of the Committee of Investigation, appointed by his Predecessor, which affected the pay and status of medical officers in the Army. He was now in communication with the Chancellor of the Exchequer upon this subject, with a view to obtain his concurrence. He pointed out, with regard to the increase in the pay of civil surgeons, that the additional amount was due, in a great measure, to the number of those practitioners now employed at the Cape. He quite admitted that the Army Medical Department was not in a satisfactory condition; and, for that reason, he ventured to propose to the Committee and to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that it should be dealt with under a Royal Warrant. It had also been decided that the six months' sick leave should, in the case of medical officers, be extended to 12 months. This, of course, would necessitate an increase in the number of officers to be employed in the Department; and as the average number of medical officers invalided was 37 during the year, the change practically meant an addition of 37 medical officers to the establishment. With regard to the military and civil clerks, it had been thought desirable to make a transfer of the charge for clerks and Army accountants, with the concurrence of the Controller and Auditor General. With regard to the increased salaries to particular officers, the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) would find, upon reference, that these were set forth according to rank in the Royal Warrant, and according to which all payments of this kind in the Army were made. In answer to the hon. and learned Member for Kildare, he hoped, in connection with the new Warrant in course of preparation, that advantage might be taken of the services of officers on half-pay resident in country towns, to whom employment would, in some cases, be open.

SIR THOMAS ACLAND hoped that the Secretary of State for War would consider whether the system in existence at Netley Hospital, which worked so well, and in accordance with which ladies superintended the care of the sick, might not be extended to other garrison hospitals.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY, referring to a draft Report by a distinguished military officer to the War Office, with reference to the cadets at Woolwich, in which it was pointed out that a half-bottle of claret was in some cases allowed to the cadets at dinner-time, by order of the medical officers, said, that it was, in his opinion, a great mistake to encourage the use of stimulants by the young men at Woolwich. He had no wish to suggest that pressure should be brought to bear upon the medical men at Woolwich; but merely expressed a hope that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would not lose sight of the suggestions of the responsible officer referred to. He desired to impress upon him the necessity of suggesting, as strongly as possible, to the medical men in charge of the cadets that the treatment prescribed for them should not include such effeminate luxuries as the gallant officer had complained of, and that it should conform, as much as possible, to the hard labour to be undergone by them hereafter. He thought it would be very prejudicial to the interests of the Academy at Woolwich that this subject should be allowed to pass unnoticed; and that, as far as practicable, the necessity for Spartan simplicity should be impressed upon the young men.

Mr. Parnell

MAJOR NOLAN had listened with much amusement to the remarks which had just been made with reference to the Royal Academy at Woolwich. The cadets at the present time were young men of 18 or 19 years of age; and there was, in his opinion, nothing in the fact of such young men drinking a pint of claret, for the young ladies in the convents at Paris were accustomed to drink wine both at breakfast and dinner. He could not help thinking that the gallant general referred to felt shocked at the progress made in the world during the last 20 years. It was a very different thing to drink a pint of claret at the present day to what it was 20 years ago, when the wine cost 10s. or 12s. a bottle. He did not think that anyone found fault with the qualities displayed by our cadets; and as long as they were physically fit for their duties, it appeared to him a matter of perfect indifference what they drank at their dinner. He could not help thinking that the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Shaughnessy) had been taken in by the Report to which he had referred.

MR. O'DONNELL rose for the purpose of protesting against the assertion of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan), that wine was the common beverage of young ladies in the convents of France. He happened to have some friends in convents in France and Belgium; and he might say that the general rule in those convents was that they were strictly prohibited from using wine of any kind. He did not wish it to go forth that wine was the common beverage of ladies in foreign convents.

MR. BIGGAR had understood the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War to state that certain alterations were under consideration, and were intended to be embodied in a Royal Warrant; but, so far as he knew, the nature of those alterations had not been stated, and he thought it would be much more satisfactory if they were explained to the Committee; if that were done, hon. Members would know what they were dividing upon. He believed that there was nothing more certain than that a man who had made a particular branch of the Profession his special study was far more thought of than an ordinary practitioner. The military authorities prepared a certain number of surgeons for the Medical Service of the Army; but, for some reason or other, they did not train a sufficient number of men for that purpose. The result was that the deficit had to be made up by the employment of irresponsible general practitioners, who had no special knowledge of the particular diseases which were likely to break out in the field, nor had had any experience of the treatment in military hospitals. In each year, recently, they had had an increased charge for the employment of these general practitioners, and a very large sum of money was paid that year by the country on account of them. He thought it would be of great use if the Committee were informed of the alterations which it was proposed to make.

MR. MELDON said, that so far as the new Warrants were concerned, the Committee was in a complete state of uncertainty. At an early period of the Session they were told that a Committee had recommended certain alterations, and that a Warrant was about to be prepared; but up to the present time they had not been told what the Warrant was to consist of. If the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would only tell them that he withheld the information as a matter of discretion, in view of the Public Service, he (Mr. Meldon) should not think of pressing his present Motion. But no such allegation was made by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman. There was another point to which no reply had been given; they had received no explanation why an extra amount of civilian medical men had been employed during the past year. The cost for those persons had increased from £500 in the year before last to no less a sum than £13,805 in the present year. It might be inferred that the present war in South Africa had something to do with that; but these Estimates had been prepared, as they had been told, before the war in South Africa broke out, and the increased amount could not be accounted for on that ground. The other question to which he should like to receive an answer was as to invalided medical men. Army surgeons were now invalided from foreign service and sent home; but they ought not to be taken out of the Service when they had recruited their health. At the present time, when a medical man was invalided and sent home he was not employed in this country when his health was restored; but a civilian was employed in his place. That was a double injury, for it deprived the officer in the Medical Service of half his pay, and it injured the public in having to pay for the civilians, who were brought in unnecessarily. There was no reason why a medical man who had been invalided from abroad, and had recruited his health in this country, should not be capable of discharging his duties at home, even if he were not capable of again undertaking foreign service. Why should the country be put to the expense of employing civilian medical officers when the medical officers of the Army were perfectly able and willing to discharge the duties? As no explanation had been offered upon these two points, he should feel himself justified in dividing upon the Motion. He could see no justification for saddling the country with the double burden of paying the civilian medical officer as well as the half-pay Army surgeon.

COLONEL LOYD LINDSAY hoped that the hon. and learned Member for Kildare would not think it necessary to divide the Committee upon this Motion. The Committee had been occupied a considerable time in the discussion of the Vote, and ample explanations had been given concerning it. One point to which attention had been directed was the increase in the item for the employment of civilian medical officers. He thought that it would be seen that the increase was, in some respect, due to the fact that civilian medical men had been sent out to the Cape, and were receiving very large remuneration—a civilian at the Cape would expect to receive much more than an officer of the Medical Department of the Army, and the allowance to those gentlemen was sometimes at the rate of two guineas, and sometimes one guinea a-day. That, he thought, was a sufficient explanation of the increase in the Vote. He thought that as the matter had now been under discussion for a long time, it would be felt that every information that could be given had been afforded, and that the Vote should now be passed. If any further information were required, he should be happy to furnish it.

Mr. PARNELL remarked, that the explanations offered did not seem to touch the point. Attention had been drawn to the fact that from £500, two years ago, the charge for the employment of civilian medical officers had now risen to £13,805. That large sum was spent in obtaining medical practitioners to undertake the duties which the Medical Staff of the Army were not sufficiently numerous to perform. He did not see, however, why so many civilians should be sent out to the Cape, for it prevented the medical officers of the Army from going there. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had alleged that the need of extra medical assistance was caused by the outbreak of the war in Zululand. But the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, in making that explanation, contradicted himself; for he told the House, on a previous occasion, that the Estimates were prepared before the war at the Cape broke out, and, therefore, without taking into account what was required for that war. Therefore, this very large sum of £13,805 was not rendered necessary by the warlike operations now being conducted in South Africa. He could not understand what seemed to him to be a very great contradiction between those two statements of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman. He should like to know how the Secretary of State for War reconciled the two statements he had made?

COLONEL STANLEY said, that it was quite true that the Estimates were prepared before the war in South Africa broke out. But when the war took place, it was necessary, from time to time, that a number of surgeons should be sent out with the columns in the field. For that purpose civilians were employed, and their pay was at a higher rate than that of the officers of the regular establishment. It should be borne in mind, however, that the gentlemen so employed would only be entitled to be paid during the time they were actually engaged, and would receive no pension.

Mr. Meldon

MR. MELDON thought that he was entitled to some little explanation of the burden of his speech, which had been passed over without remark. He had stated, that if it was a matter of discretion with his right hon. and gallant Friend to conceal the contents of the Warrant which he proposed issuing, he would not press the matter; if, in the exercise of his discretion, he had told the Committee that he felt bound to withhold the information, then he (Mr. Meldon) should not feel himself compelled to go to a division upon the matter. In respect of medical officers invalided from foreign service, it was not for an increase of their leave that he applied—although he was bound to say that he was very grateful for the concession in that direction—but it was with respect to the employment of civilians in their place when they were competent for the duty. A civilian was employed to discharge the duties of an officer of the Medical Service and was paid in full, while the Army medical officer was kept on half-pay. He thought that the medical officer belonging to the Service should be employed in some Department so soon as he was certified to be fit for it. This point had not been noticed by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, and he hoped they would have some explanation with regard to it.

COLONEL STANLEY stated, that he had explained twice what was the intention of the Government. On the first occasion the hon. and learned Gentleman was not present, and he thought the explanation was accepted as satisfactory by the Committee. He repeated the explanation when the hon. and learned Gentleman resumed his place, though not at great length, for there were limits to the patience even of the Committee. With regard to the point that he had pressed upon him, he would repeat what he had previously said, that he was not aware of having received any communication from the hon. and learned Gentleman with respect to the matter; but, if he would allow him, he would refer to his correspondence and ascertain the fact. It was not correct to state, as the hon. and learned Member for Kildare did, that half-pay officers were paid for doing nothing.

They were paid to recover their health, and they were paid in order that they might recruit themselves for performing their duties to their country. It was not always found possible to employ a man at home directly he was invalided from India. They had, in the first instance, to look at the duties to be performed; and, in the second, to the persons to perform those duties.

MR. MELDON remarked, that after what had taken place, he did not think it would be of any use troubling the Committee to divide, and he should, therefore, be willing to withdraw his Amendment.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. PARNELL considered the answer of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War to the questions that had been put to him not at all satisfactory. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman had stated, in reply to his question, that he was not able to say positively that the wounded Zulus had been treated in the military hospitals. He knew that this was an unpleasant subject, because it involved the suggestion that our troops in South Africa had not been carrying on the war in a civilized manner. But he thought it better to go into this matter then, in order to prevent any further mischief being done. Would the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War take some notice of this matter as regarded the authorities in South Africa? Would he write out to the authorities there, telling them that attention had been directed to the apparent absence of any hospitality, or other form of humanity, towards the wounded Zulus, as was usual? Or, would he further say that it had been thought a remarkable fact that none of the enemy's wounded had been taken into our hospitals? The newspaper correspondents had not mentioned that any wounded had been taken into the military hospitals. If anything of that sort had happened, there was no doubt that the fact would have been mentioned—that wounded Zulus had been brought in and received hospital treatment. But there had been a significant absence of any tidings of that character; and, on the contrary, reports of another sort had been spread. That morning there was a letter published in one of the Dublin newspapers of a very remarkable character, which professed to come from an officer serving in South Africa. The letter was addressed to a medical student, by whom it was sent to the newspaper. After describing the action at Ginghulov, and the defeat of the Zulus, the writer went on to say that when the Zulus were in retreat the Native Auxiliaries attacked them, and played the devil with them. All the wounded were assailed by them, and after the battle no less than 487 dead Zulus were buried.

THE CHAIRMAN felt himself bound to point out to the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) that the matter to which he was now alluding could not be said to have any reference to the point before the Committee. What the hon. Gentleman was alluding to could not reasonably be connected with what might be called attention to the prisoners falling into the hands of the British Forces. He must point out to the hon. Member that he was entirely departing from the subject of the Medical Service of the Army, and was dealing with the conduct of the British troops in the field with regard to the wounded of the enemy—a matter which had nothing to do with the Army Medical Service.

MR. SULLIVAN observed that, of course, the Chairman's decision would be acquiesced in by his hon. Friends, although it seemed to him (Mr. Sullivan) that that decision might be contested. He believed, however, that it had never been, and never would be, questioned. He would wish to point out that they were then discussing the Vote for the Medical Service of the Army. If the Medical Service of the Army were not efficiently rendered, it was open to hon. Members to move to reduce the Vote. Those services were not efficiently rendered, if the medical officers in attendance upon the troops in South Africa did not care for the wounded Zulus who might fall into their hands. With all respect to those gentlemen he must say, that if they did not care for the wounded Zulus that fell into the hands of the British, they would not be doing their duty; and if the medical officers did not do their duty, it was open to the Committee to challenge the Vote.

Mr. Parnell

MR. A. F. EGERTON rose to Order. He ventured to think that the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan), in contesting the opinion of the Chair, was himself entirely out of Order.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that it was open to any Member of the Committee to urge a point of Order. The hon. and learned Member did not seem to him to have intended to exceed his right in speaking to Order; but he had endeavoured, so far as he could, and to the best of his ability, to lay down what he believed to be the rule of the Committee upon the subject. He presumed that if the hon. and learned Member for Louth seriously wished to contest the ruling of the Chair, he would take the course which was open to him of making a Motion to report Progress, in order that the Committee might be fortified by the opinion of the House. He understood the hon. and learned Member to be addressing his observations to the Chair, in order to change the view which he had held it right to express upon the subject. Therefore, he did not think it incumbent upon him, so far, to stop him in the remarks he was making. If the hon. and learned Member seriously intended to dispute the ruling of the Chair, it was open to him to move to report Progress, in order that the matter might be brought before the House.

MR. SULLIVAN thanked the Chairman for his decision upon the point which was now raised. He did not understand him that he ruled his hon. Friend was out of Order. He believed he was correct in saying that he had not ruled that the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) was out of Order, but that he was going somewhat wide of the mark, which was a very different thing.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that he had endeavoured to explain to the Committee his opinion that the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) was out of Order; he was still of that opinion.

MR. PARNELL inquired whether the Chairman had ruled that he was out of Order in directing attention to the necessity of treating the wounded Zulus who might be taken in action in South Africa in the same way as their own soldiers were treated? As he understood the ruling, it was that he was out of Order in reading extracts from a letter which bore, in his opinion, not upon the question of the treatment of the wounded would only be entitled to be paid during the time they were actually engaged, and would receive no pension.

MR. MELDON thought that he was entitled to some little explanation of the burden of his speech, which had been passed over without remark. He had stated, that if it was a matter of discretion with his right hon. and gallant Friend to conceal the contents of the Warrant which he proposed issuing, he would not press the matter; if, in the exercise of his discretion, he had told the Committee that he felt bound to withhold the information, then he (Mr. Meldon) should not feel himself compelled to go to a division upon the matter. In respect of medical officers invalided from foreign service, it was not for an increase of their leave that he applied—although he was bound to say that he was very grateful for the concession in that direction—but it was with respect to the employment of civilians in their place when they were competent for the duty. A civilian was employed to discharge the duties of an officer of the Medical Service and was paid in full, while the Army medical officer was kept on half-pay. He thought that the medical officer belonging to the Service should be employed in some Department so soon as he was certified to be fit for it. This point had not been noticed by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, and he hoped they would have some explanation with regard to it.

COLONEL STANLEY stated, that he had explained twice what was the intention of the Government. On the first occasion the hon. and learned Gentleman was not present, and he thought the explanation was accepted as satisfactory by the Committee. He repeated the explanation when the hon. and learned Gentleman resumed his place, though not at great length, for there were limits to the patience even of the Committee. With regard to the point that he had pressed upon him, he would repeat what he had previously said, that he was not aware of having received any communication from the hon. and learned Gentleman with respect to the matter; but, if he would allow him, he would refer to his correspondence and ascertain the fact. It was not correct to state, as the hon. and learned Member for Kildare did, that half-pay officers were paid for doing nothing.

They were paid to recover their health, and they were paid in order that they might recruit themselves for performing their duties to their country. It was not always found possible to employ a man at home directly he was invalided from India. They had, in the first instance, to look at the duties to be performed; and, in the second, to the persons to perform those duties.

MR. MELDON remarked, that after what had taken place, he did not think it would be of any use troubling the Committee to divide, and he should, therefore, be willing to withdraw his Amendment.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. PARNELL considered the answer of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War to the questions that had been put to him not at all satisfactory. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman had stated, in reply to his question, that he was not able to say positively that the wounded Zulus had been treated in the military hospitals. He knew that this was an unpleasant subject, because it involved the suggestion that our troops in South Africa had not been carrying on the war in a civilized manner. But he thought it better to go into this matter then, in order to prevent any further mischief being done. Would the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War take some notice of this matter as regarded the authorities in South Africa? Would he write out to the authorities there, telling them that attention had been directed to the apparent absence of any hospitality, or other form of humanity, towards the wounded Zulus, as was usual? Or, would he further say that it had been thought a remarkable fact that none of the enemy's wounded had been taken into our hospitals? The newspaper correspondents had not mentioned that any wounded had been taken into the military hospitals. If anything of that sort had happened, there was no doubt that the fact would have been mentioned—that wounded Zulus had been brought in and received hospital treatment. But there had been a significant absence of any tidings of that character; and, on the contrary, reports of another sort had papers, and from information which had come to his knowledge in other ways, an opinion had grown up that wounded Zulus had been inhumanly treated in this war. It was, however, impossible for hon. Members to get authenticated instances of any such cases. They could not, from the necessity of the case, obtain any precise information; but judging from the evidence in the newspapers, and from the fact that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had admitted that the Zulus were objectionable prisoners of war and objectionable inmates of hospitals, they could only think that the ordinary customs of war had not been followed in their case. All they asked the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to do, under the circumstances of the case, was to mention the matter in his communications, so that no mistake might be made in the future.

SIR ANDREW LUSK thought it very unfair to bring charges of improper treatment of the wounded against officers of the Medical Staff when none of them were present to defend themselves. The hon. and learned Member for Louth had stated that he heard this and he heard that about what went on in South Africa. The hon. and learned Gentleman, who was himself a lawyer, would know that if he came before a Court of Justice, and talked as he was talking there that night, no one would listen to him for one moment. The charges which he was bringing against the medical officers were mere hearsay, and based upon correspondence in newspapers and allegations that someone had told him; and he asked the hon. and learned Gentleman whether he would be listened to for one instant in a legal tribunal; and, if not, could he expect to be listened to any more in the Committee?

DR. LUSH was very sorry that this question had arisen in connection with this particular Vote; for it seemed to him that the discussion had wandered very much away from the Medical Service of the Army. Allegations had been made that the officers in the Army Medical Service had been, personally, and in their individual capacity, guilty of cruelty. It seemed to him that these charges had been brought against those gentlemen simply for the purpose of bringing before the Committee the alleged conduct of the troops in South Africa. If that were so, it was a very ungenerous thing to a body of men who, so far as he knew, had always done their duty.

MR. MACDONALD said, that there was one fact patent, and that one fact was that there was a concurrent testimony, be it right or be it wrong, appearing in a paper here and a paper there. It was said to be a letter from an officer, or from a soldier, or from other parties. They had no evidence that it was false, as they had no evidence that it was true, other than these repeated statements. Besides those printed and circulated, he was aware there were many—very many—others, he had seen not a few himself; but he did think there was a concurrent testimony cropping up all over the country; and, although he thought the statements might be false, or might be very reckless, yet, to satisfy the public mind, the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War ought to give an assurance to the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) that there would be sent out instructions, of a character that could not be misunderstood, that if any wounded Zulus were spared, they should have the treatment that others had. The allegation was that they were not spared. To use the language of a letter he had seen—“They murder all they meet, wounded or not, so that they should never attend the war dance again.” If that allegation was not correct, still the order would not be an improper one, and it would give the Commander-in-Chief, and all concerned, an opportunity of vindicating their character from aspersions that were not true.

COLONEL NORTH hoped the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would not insult the Medical Officers by sending out any instructions of the sort. Perhaps the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald) might believe the reports. He (Colonel North) believed that if the people throughout England, Ireland, and Scotland were to be polled, no one would be found to say that he believed a British soldier would act in such a way towards a wounded enemy.

MR. MACDONALD: I believe it.

MR. LOWTHIAN BELL said, that if there was any ground in the complaints respecting the treatment of Zulu prisoners, these should be inquired into at a proper time; but upon what earthly ground the existence of these reports had been set forth to interrupt the pro-

Mr. Parnell

Zulus, but upon the conduct of the troops in slaughtering wounded Zulus whom they might find upon the field.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the rule he endeavoured to lay down was that so long as the hon. Member was discussing the medical treatment of the wounded, he was not exceeding the subject under discussion; but when he entered upon the subject of the conduct of the troops to the wounded in the field, he was out of Order.

MR. SULLIVAN asked, what single syllable had fallen from his hon. Friend the Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) which exceeded the limits laid down by the Chairman? He did not think that his hon. Friend had uttered a single word, except with regard to the medical officers accompanying the troops, and their duties towards the prisoners who were taken. How, therefore, could his hon. Friend be out of Order in the observations he had made? He must complain of the attempt which had been made from the Treasury Bench to overawe the Chair, and to urge the Chairman further in his ruling than was fair, and further than he intended to go. He thought that the Committee was bound to resist any attempt on the part of the Treasury Bench to intimidate and mislead the Chair into unnecessarily ruling hon. Members on that side of the House out of Order.

MR. A. F. EGERTON observed, that the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) had entirely misunderstood his observations. He simply said that the hon. and learned Member was contesting the ruling of the Chair. As to intimidating or overawing the Chair, that was not his intention; his only object was to support the Chairman in his ruling.

COLONEL NORTH said, the officers of our Army in the field had treated all the prisoners that fell into their hands as they ought to do. It was a most unfair thing to make charges against the medical officers of the Army of having acted inhumanly towards the enemy, when those gentlemen were not there to defend themselves. If hon. Members knew of any particular offences which had been committed, let them say it; but it was not right to slander a body of men by making sweeping accusations against them, as had been done.

MR. SULLIVAN said, that no imputation had been made upon the medical officers of the Army, because they had never been afforded a chance of attending to the enemies wounded; and he was sure if they had been, they would have done their duty. He believed that they would treat a wounded Zulu in every way as if he were one of their own comrades.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that the conduct of the British troops in the field had been impugned, and it was necessary to consider upon what evidence. So far as he could see, no evidence was adduced except that of some private letters. He was bound to point out that it was by no means certain that a wounded Zulu would be a proper inmate of our military hospitals; and there might be very grave reasons against admitting wounded Zulus to them. It was also worthy of remark that the Zulus, like all savage races, were, so far as they knew, in the habit of carrying off their wounded from the field, if they could possibly do so. Owing to that reason, he presumed it was that so few wounded Zulus had apparently been found. In no official Report had it been found necessary, owing to their small number, to take cognizance of the wounded Zulus found upon the field of battle. If the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) could produce to him any authenticated cases with regard to the slaughter of, or inhumanity towards, wounded Zulus, he would inquire into it. But he thought it required an authenticated case, before any reliance could be placed upon the reports which had been spread in this matter.

MR. PARNELL thought that the request which he had made was a very reasonable one, and he had hoped that it would have been responded to more fully than it had been. He asked the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War to give notice of the fact, in some way or other, that attention had been directed in that House to no prisoners seeming to have been treated in or out of the hospitals in the field. If the right hon. and gallant Gentleman directed attention to that matter, the authorities in South Africa, if they had not done it already, would then take proper care of the wounded. He did not wish to bring charges against officers of the Army Medical Service; on the contrary, he knew a great many Army medical officers, and believed them to be a very good set of men. At the same time, from accounts in newspapers, and from information which had come to his knowledge in other ways, an opinion had grown up that wounded Zulus had been inhumanly treated in this war. It was, however, impossible for hon. Members to get authenticated instances of any such cases. They could not, from the necessity of the case, obtain any precise information; but judging from the evidence in the newspapers, and from the fact that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had admitted that the Zulus were objectionable prisoners of war and objectionable inmates of hospitals, they could only think that the ordinary customs of war had not been followed in their case. All they asked the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to do, under the circumstances of the case, was to mention the matter in his communications, so that no mistake might be made in the future.

SIR ANDREW LUSK thought it very unfair to bring charges of improper treatment of the wounded against officers of the Medical Staff when none of them were present to defend themselves. The hon. and learned Member for Louth had stated that he heard this and he heard that about what went on in South Africa. The hon. and learned Gentleman, who was himself a lawyer, would know that if he came before a Court of Justice, and talked as he was talking there that night, no one would listen to him for one moment. The charges which he was bringing against the medical officers were mere hearsay, and based upon correspondence in newspapers and allegations that someone had told him; and he asked the hon. and learned Gentleman whether he would be listened to for one instant in a legal tribunal; and, if not, could he expect to be listened to any more in the Committee?

DR. LUSH was very sorry that this question had arisen in connection with this particular Vote; for it seemed to him that the discussion had wandered very much away from the Medical Service of the Army. Allegations had been made that the officers in the Army Medical Service had been, personally, and in their individual capacity, guilty of cruelty. It seemed to him that these charges had been brought against those gentlemen simply for the purpose of bringing before the Committee the alleged conduct of the troops in South Africa. If that were so, it was a very ungenerous thing to a body of men who, so far as he knew, had always done their duty.

MR. MACDONALD said, that there was one fact patent, and that one fact was that there was a concurrent testimony, be it right or be it wrong, appearing in a paper here and a paper there. It was said to be a letter from an officer, or from a soldier, or from other parties. They had no evidence that it was false, as they had no evidence that it was true, other than these repeated statements. Besides those printed and circulated, he was aware there were many—very many—others, he had seen not a few himself; but he did think there was a concurrent testimony cropping up all over the country; and, although he thought the statements might be false, or might be very reckless, yet, to satisfy the public mind, the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War ought to give an assurance to the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) that there would be sent out instructions, of a character that could not be misunderstood, that if any wounded Zulus were spared, they should have the treatment that others had. The allegation was that they were not spared. To use the language of a letter he had seen — “They murder all they meet, wounded or not, so that they should never attend the war dance again.” If that allegation was not correct, still the order would not be an improper one, and it would give the Commander-in-Chief, and all concerned, an opportunity of vindicating their character from aspersions that were not true.

COLONEL NORTH hoped the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would not insult the Medical Officers by sending out any instructions of the sort. Perhaps the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald) might believe the reports. He (Colonel North) believed that if the people throughout England, Ireland, and Scotland were to be polled, no one would be found to say that he believed a British soldier would act in such a way towards a wounded enemy.

MR. MACDONALD: I believe it.

MR. LOWTHIAN BELL said, that if there was any ground in the complaints respecting the treatment of Zulu prisoners, these should be inquired into at a proper time; but upon what earthly ground the existence of these reports had been set forth to interrupt the progress of Business, he was at a loss to conceive. He hoped that hon. Members below the Gangway would cease their obstruction.

Mr. Parnell

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY did not believe the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) had any intention to cast any aspersions upon the troops at the Cape. But with regard to the soldiers, was there anything very wonderful that in an Army which, unfortunately, had fallen into disorganization, which had suffered a stinging defeat, and which had been massacred by hundreds—was it anything so very improbable that the survivors of those men should have their passions stirred by seeing their comrades laid low, and that they should sometimes fall into acts of violence?

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and learned Member is again straying into the same error as that of which I have had to remind others. The Question before the Committee is the charge for the Army Medical Department, which has nothing to do with the combatant Forces.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY did not think there would be much necessity for dwelling upon that subject for the future. The troops in South Africa were about to be commanded by a competent man, and he thought the Army Medical Vote would be properly administered under his care; and he also believed that the Zulu prisoners under the care of an Irish General—Sir Garnet Wolseley, who had shown not merely his capacity, but his humanity and generosity, in dealing with savage races, whom he had subdued in other parts of the globe—would get under his command and government a humanity which they had not experienced under the present Commander.

COLONEL STANLEY rose to Order. He was bound to say that he thought the hon. and learned Gentleman would have learned sufficient from the Profession of which he was a member to impress upon him the necessity of speaking to the Question which was the subject-matter of debate, and of not venturing on assertions inferentially made, and which, at the proper time and place, he (Colonel Stanley) should have been perfectly willing to come down to the House and meet. He understood that they were at that moment discussing the question of the Army Medical Department. Part of that Department was engaged at the Cape. It was in charge of seven hospitals there, and into those hospitals certain Zulu prisoners were brought. That was the whole point by which that question could be connected with the Vote. Well, what was the state of things. Assertions were made, and the hon. Members who made them asked him, as Secretary of State, to write out to the Cape, casting imputations upon the whole of a Service which had nobly performed its duty. They asked him to accept statements upon which they were not prepared to produce evidence, and, upon such evidence as that, to cast a slur upon the whole of the Medical Department. Now, he said before—and he did not want to be tempted beyond the proper course of debate by any means whatever—that he wished it to be understood, once for all, that unless, as in other matters, these reports were properly authenticated, he should take no notice of them. If cases were authenticated by hon. Members, and they would write to him on their own responsibility as Members of Parliament, he would forward such cases for inquiry and report. He had done so in other and similar matters, even though he believed there was no more truth in them than there was in the present instance. He did not for a moment dispute that hon. Members might be in the exercise of their discretion in believing those reports; but he did know that there was a great deal of loose lying, and that there were many cases which had been inquired into long before they met the eyes of hon. Members, and which had turned out to have nothing in them. If hon. Members, as Members of that House, would send him any statements which they fairly believed to be authentic, he would forward them for inquiry; but he would not be the means, directly or indirectly, once for all, of throwing broadcast upon a noble body of men what he would almost call the foul imputations that had been cast upon them by anonymous correspondents.

MR. PARNELL said, that the device that had been adopted by hon. Members sitting on his side of the House, and also on the other, and which he regretted to see was imitated by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, of imputing to them a wish to make any charge against the Army Medical Department, was by no means new. He had seen it before, when they had thought it necessary, in the exercise of their duty, to make statements of a similar kind. Now, he would say that there was not one syllable of ground for the statement of the Secretary of State for War, that they were making any charge against the Army Medical Department. Not a single word that he had said, or that any other hon. Member had said, could be so construed, and he was surprised to see the Secretary of State for War take advantage of so stale and unworthy a device. Now, what was the position they had taken up there that night? They had not said that the Army Medical Department in South Africa had refused to treat Zulu prisoners when brought to the hospital. If they had said so, there would have been some ground for the taunts of hon. Members opposite. What they had said was, that the Zulu prisoners were not brought into those hospitals, and they simply asked that the military operations should be conducted in such a manner that the Zulu wounded should find their way into the hospitals; just as well as if they were English. There was no room for the statements that had been made. The Army Medical Department was a noble Service. It had been abused and ill-treated by the authorities. It was largely composed of Irishmen; and it would ill become him, or any other Irishman, to asperse a Department of that kind. He repeated, that not a single word that he had said could give the slightest shadow of ground for the unfounded statements made with regard to him that evening. He had asked the Secretary of State for War to give such directions as would prevent the fear that things were not going on in South Africa, with respect to that Service, as they ought. What did the right hon. and gallant Gentleman tell them? He said, let them bring cases to him, and he would inquire into them. Now, the Secretary of State for War must know that such a request was altogether illusory. He should never think of taking cases to the Secretary of State for War, unless he (Mr. Parnell) had had the opportunity of inquiring into them himself. Private Members could not send out a Commission to take evidence as to the treatment of wounded prisoners in South Africa. The idea was perfectly absurd and preposterous. They simply asked that the tenour of the instructions given in South Africa should be such as to prevent a repetition of what they feared was going on there, and he himself should take a division on that Vote, unless he got a satisfactory answer. ["Divide, divide!"] He should divide just when he pleased. They believed they knew what they were about; though hon. Members above the Gangway presumed to dictate to them the way in which they should discharge their duties. They would show that they were not afraid of being in a small minority, and so he begged to move the reduction of the Vote by £5,000.

Mr. Parnell

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out, that a Motion to reduce the Vote by £5,000 had already been withdrawn, and asked the hon. Member to name some other sum.

MR. PARNELL accordingly moved to reduce the Vote by £4,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed.

"That a sum, not exceeding £262,200, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for Medical Establishments and Services, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880."—(Mr. Parnell.)

MR. NORWOOD said, that the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) had repelled, with some little warmth, a feeling which he thought prevailed to some extent in the Committee—that in the observations which the hon. Member for Meath had made to them, some imputations had, inferentially, been cast upon the medical officers in South Africa. Well, let them admit it, and he would give the hon. Member credit for his assertion. But he (Mr. Norwood) felt that the Committee must distinctly be of opinion that if the hon. Member had not aspersed the Medical Department, he had most distinctly aspersed the character of the military officers. And what was the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Shaughnessy)? An aspersion, and a very gross aspersion, had distinctly been made, if not upon the Medical Department, at least upon the combatant Department, for he went out of his way to taunt Lord Chelmsford with cruelty and incapacity, to claim Sir Garnet Wolseley as an Irishman, and, on that ground, to hope for more humanity and justice to the Zulus. Now, he (Mr. Norwood) wished to say a word upon the proceedings of that evening, as an independent Member of that House, and he must say that he thought they had reason to complain of the conduct of the Government. They did not show sufficient firmness in meeting the difficulties put in the way of the transaction of the Business of the House. He admired the temper and the gentlemanly forbearance of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War. He (Mr. Norwood) had heard him on three occasions make almost similar replies upon the same point. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Kildare (Mr. Meldon) had made three speeches which were almost precisely similar. That very debate on the treatment of their Medical Officers had been started two hours previously. It had been discussed, the issue had then been abandoned, and now it was re-started. Now, what he (Mr. Norwood) ventured to tell right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Bench was, that they were not conducting Business in the way in which the Business of the country ought to be conducted, and which independent Members and the country had a right to expect. There was an absence of firmness and of determination, and of want of fulfilment of duty as a Governing Body in the way in which they went to work. Instead of humbly apologizing to hon. Gentlemen for taking up the time of the House in the way they were, they should display more firmness and decision. Why was not a division taken a long time ago? The fact was simply this—The state into which the Business of the House had lately drifted was a disgrace to Parliament. He had not the slightest hesitation in saying so; and if some steps were not taken soon to enable them to perform their functions in a proper way, it would be impossible to transact any Business at all. How could the Government expect hon. Members to come down there night after night to attend to their duties simply for the purpose of finding hour after hour wasted? He cordially agreed with the remarks of the hon. and gallant Member for Oxfordshire (Colonel North), that the observations that had been made in regard to valuable public servants were most painful, uncalled for, and unjust.

He protested strongly against them; and if the Government did not show more strength than they had shown of late, how the Business of the country was to be conducted he could not possibly conceive. They were passing no Bills and getting through no Business, and the want of firmness and decision on the part of the Government was perfectly surprising. If they were not strong enough to manage the Business of the House of Commons, the sooner they changed sides with the Opposition the better.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT agreed with what had been stated by the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Norwood). Things had now come to a pretty pass. [Laughter.] He heard hon. Gentlemen laughing at that remark; but they would not laugh by-and-bye, because they would find the whole of the country against them. They came down there to do the Business of the country, and night after night they were prevented from proceeding by hon. Gentlemen opposite below the Gangway. He found no fault with hon. Members who got up to call attention to particular subjects; but nobody was going to tell him—because they were not a parcel of fools—that they were to waste four or five hours in discussing a single Vote in Supply. He ventured to say that the country had not realized the position in which they stood in this matter. They had sat there quietly and patiently, until they saw that nothing was to be gained by remaining patient any longer. He said to the Government that they had a right to be protected. They had no right to be called upon to come down to the House to be muzzled in the expression of their opinions as they were; because, if they got up to make any remarks, hon. Members opposite took every opportunity of turning those remarks to their own purpose, and that was, to obstruct the Business of the House.

MR. PARNELL said, the hon. and gallant Baronet opposite (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) had thought proper to bring a charge against hon. Members of that House by saying that they had a purpose of their own, which was to stop the Business of the House. Now, that was a very serious charge. They might be a very small number, and hon. Members might think to put them down. They could turn them out of the House for that matter. For his own part, he should go with pleasure.

THE CHAIRMAN stated, that the hon. Member for Meath was not at that moment speaking to the point of Order.

MR. PARNELL said, he would ask whether the hon. and gallant Baronet was in Order in imputing to Members on that side of the House a deliberate purpose in stopping Business?

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, the hon. and gallant Baronet opposite (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) had spoken of hon. Members below the Gangway obstructing Business. He sat below the Gangway. He had never sat anywhere else, and he must protest against those remarks being made applicable to all hon. Members. He never came to the House, except to further the Business of the House; and the hon. and gallant Baronet ought not to have included all Members below the Gangway.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) has asked me whether the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) is in Order in imputing to him a deliberate purpose of stopping the Business of the House? It appears to me it was an opinion which it was quite open to the hon. and gallant Baronet to form, and an opinion which was not expressed in un-Parliamentary language.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, he was very sorry for the interruption of the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon), because the hon. and gallant Baronet knew that he (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) had not got up to impute to him that he impeded the Business of the House, unless it was necessary. His hon. and gallant Friend was a man of common sense, and knew that he was not referred to. [Mr. PARNELL: Because he is a Scotch Member.] Because he was a Scotch Member! Did the hon. Member for Meath think he (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) picked out Irish Members? Why, he had the greatest respect for many Irish Members; but when he saw the Business of the House stopped in that way, he thought it was time that some hon. Member should stand up in his place and say that Business was being stopped, and would continue to be stopped, unless some means were found to shorten the discussion that was going on. A fair, business-like discussion no man objected to; but he did object to coming down night after night to see time wasted in fruitless talk. But, before he sat down, he wished to give the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Shaughnessy) an opportunity of retracting his statement. He was sure the hon. and learned Member would not have said willingly what he did not believe to be true; but he had imputed to Lord Chelmsford feelings, and ways of carrying on operations at the Cape, which he (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) was quite certain, on cool reflection, he would be the first to withdraw. The hon. and learned Member said that an Irish General was now going out who would put everything straight; and he had deliberately stated that all these atrocities—in which he (Sir Walter B. Barttelot), however, did not believe—were committed with the connivance of the General Commanding-in-Chief. That was a statement which ought to be retracted, and he gave the hon. and learned Member the opportunity of doing so.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY thanked the hon. and gallant Member (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) for the appeal he had made to him. He did not think it necessary to reply to imputations which could not have applied to him, as he had never been among the Party of Obstruction. But he did think it necessary, and very necessary, out of respect for the General and other officers in South Africa, and also out of respect for the troops serving there, to explain what he had said. In the first place, he did not mean to impute any inhumanity to their medical officers in Africa. He knew that the Army Medical Staff in Africa and anywhere else were highly humane. With regard to their Army, he was betrayed by the warmth of the moment into language which, in cooler moments, he should not have used. What he had meant to convey was that probably the blood of the soldiers was up in consequence of seeing their brothers-in-arms slaughtered. He believed that there had been an excess of cruelty on their part, and that such things should be put an end to. The supposed isolated acts to which he had referred were, in his opinion, attributable to the imperfect organization existing in South Africa. But in using the words "incapacity" and "inhumanity"—and here he particularly asked the indulgence of the Committee—he meant to convey that our troops were allowed to get into a state of passion, and that the dictates of humanity were consequently not observed by them: He admitted that he had spoken violently, and begged pardon of the Committee for having raised his voice to a point which, perhaps, was not conducive to a man's speaking rationally. He had not meant to impute inhumanity to Lord Chelmsford, or anything like inhumanity to our troops; but wished to point out that, like the troops of France, Germany, or any other country in the world, their blood being stirred up, they had perpetrated isolated acts of inhumanity, and were not unlikely to do so again.

Mr. Parnell

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I think, after what has fallen from the hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. O'Shaughnessy), we may fairly consider that this incident may be closed. He expressed his regret, in terms with which the House will sympathize, at having been betrayed into language which could not but cause pain, and which, at the same time, could not but call forth replies such as have been made. I am sure that, after what the hon. and learned Gentleman has said, the Committee will not desire to pursue the matter any further. I only rise for a moment to say a word in reply to what has fallen from the hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Norwood), and from my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot). They have made remarks which I must frankly say I am not at all surprised to hear made by hon. Members in this House, considering the very great inconvenience which they have found for some time in the conduct of the Business of the House, and the very great delay which takes place in proceeding with that Business. I must frankly admit that, having sat for a good many years in this House, I have never known a time when so great a delay in the conduct of Business has taken place in the manner which we have recently seen. So far as it is in my power, and in that of my Colleagues, to prevent that delay, and to expedite Business, I can only assure hon. Gentlemen that we are most anxious to get the work properly forward, and to conduct the Business of the House in a creditable manner. But I must appeal to a sense of justice on the part of the House as to the position in which the Government are placed in matters of this kind. It is impossible for us to interfere with the ordinary conduct of Business, so long as it is conducted according to the Rules of Order, and I, for one, do not see how we are to interpose and protest more than we have occasionally done, and shall be prepared at any time to do, against the waste of time. But I must remind my hon. and gallant Friend that when we have attempted to introduce or propose alterations or amendments in the Rules of the House which, as we thought, might have led to somewhat greater expedition in the conduct of Business, we did not find a great disposition to support or accept the proposals which were made, and we consequently found it very difficult to effect alterations in the Rules for the conduct of Business, even where alterations might have been made which, without interfering with the freedom of debate, would have materially conduced to the object which we had in view. I can now only express a hope that we may not by recriminations add to the loss of time which has already taken place, in endeavouring to fix the responsibility for such delay. I need not say that if the intention of the House is to support the Government, we will endeavour on all occasions to bring forward our measures in the way most convenient, and to prosecute our Business with as much despatch as possible. We are quite as anxious as are hon. Members in getting forward the Business of the House, and nobody can be more interested than the Government in doing so. I can assure the Committee that we are thankful to those who come forward, at a great sacrifice of time, to assist and support us, and I would now suggest that the best thing we can do is to come to a vote upon this Estimate.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, he was as anxious as any man that the Committee should, according to the phrase used by three hon. Members who had successively addressed it, "be allowed to transact its Business," the obstruction of which had been brought forward as a charge against hon. Gentlemen on his side of the Gangway. It appeared to him (Mr. O'Connor Power that the discussion upon the general Business of the House, and upon the manner in which it was transacted by the Government, had as little to do with the subject before the Committee as the atrocities alleged to have been committed in the Zulu War. However, they had it upon the authority of the Chairman that those observations were in Order, and he therefore presumed that anyone would be equally in Order in resenting the imputations put forward. The Business before the Committee was the examination of the Estimates; and he would inform the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot), that he charged him with attempting by tall talk to intimidate hon. Members in the discharge of their duty; and, moreover, wished to remind him that on every preceding occasion, when any such attempt had been made, it had always ended in failure. Hon. Members were invited to come from Ireland and Scotland to discuss certain Estimates, and when they rose, in the discharge of their duties, to discuss them, it was said that the Business of the country was being stopped, and they were called upon to be silent. He maintained that if they had no right to criticize the Estimates according to their own discretion, they had no right to be in the House at all. When an Irish Member was sent to the House of Commons, he was not told by his constituents to shape his course according to the views of the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex. He (Mr. O'Connor Power) was as free as the hon. and gallant Baronet, and refused to have any line of conduct chalked out for his observance. If the House had more work to do than it could perform, the only remedy was to divide the work, and allow each class of Representatives to do their share; but as Irish Members had been invited to sit in the House of Commons, it was not open to the House to complain of the consequence of its own act. Now, with reference to the matter which gave rise to these observations; the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) had found that he was called upon, as a Member of the Committee, to consent to the very large Vote of £200,000 for the Army Medical Department, and he ventured to call attention to a branch of that Department which he conceived was in a position such as he (Mr. O'Connor Power) was bound to admit he had not succeeded in establishing. It turned out that the complaint should have been brought against the men who failed to bring the Zulu wounded into hospital. That was, so far, very well; but the hon. Member for Meath went further, and asked the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War to send instructions to the South African contingent of the Army Medical Department in reference to the treatment of Zulu prisoners. He thought that if the hon. Member for Meath had not gone quite so far as that, and if he had simply called upon the Secretary of State for War to make inquiries, he would have been standing upon more solid ground, and that the Secretary of State for War could not have refused so just and reasonable a demand. At the same time, he quite agreed that it would be unreasonable, on the mere strength of newspaper reports, to write out special instructions reflecting upon the character of the Army Medical Department; but, on the other hand, he thought that the Secretary of State for War might have said—"These matters which have been brought forward by hon. Members have attracted so much attention, and are of sufficient public interest, that I will inquire into them, and if I find the facts to be as they are represented, I will endeavour to prevent them in future." But the Committee had received no such assurance from the Secretary of State for War, who had simply pooch-pooched the allegations, and the possibility of the acts to which they referred having been committed. He (Mr. O'Connor Power) had no objection whatever to a Division when the time arrived; but if hon. Members opposite insisted upon stating their view of the case, they must not complain that the other side should get a hearing. It had been said more than once that evening that no member of the Army Medical Department, and he believed an hon. and gallant Gentleman from behind the Treasury Bench had stated that no English regiment, would have been guilty of the cruelty complained of; but was it supposed that nothing was known of the progress of the English arms in India? He (Mr. O'Connor Power) maintained that there was no act of cruelty which had not been committed by British soldiers and officers in building up the Indian Empire.

Mr. O'Connor Power

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER rose to Order.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the discussion of this question had arisen from the allegation made by the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell), who was dissatisfied with the conduct of the Government, and put that forward as the ground on which he moved his Amendment. The discussion had, in consequence, turned rather on the conduct of the Government than on the Vote now before the Committee. He must point out that the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power), in reflecting upon the conduct of the Army, in different parts of the world, was clearly out of Order.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER would regret to occupy the time of the Committee after it had been ruled that any particular line of argument was out of Order. He would not do that; but he might be allowed to say, in his own defence, that he had endeavoured to confine himself within the allegations made on this side of the House. He had said that the whole point of the discussion was that the attention of Her Majesty's Government had been called to certain alleged atrocities, in the conduct of the war in South Africa, in respect of the treatment of the wounded of the Zulu Army. Now, he asked the Secretary of State for War not to send out instructions in consequence of the reports referred to, for that would be asking him to do more than the circumstances of the case demanded; but, inasmuch as the character of the Army Medical Department was at stake, to give an assurance that inquiry should be made into the truth of the reports in question. If the hon. Member for Meath went to a Division, he (Mr. O'Connor Power) should probably vote with him, meaning thereby to express that these reports were worthy of inquiry, and not intending to convey that they were worthy of special instructions being sent out.

MR. SULLIVAN said, no doubt, a great deal of warmth and misunderstanding had prevailed in the course of the discussion, nor could he complain of hon. Members resenting what they believed to be an imputation upon the humanity of the British soldier. He should reprehend in the strongest manner the slightest imputation upon the skill or humanity of the Medical Staff. As the most efficacious way of terminating this discussion, he appealed to his hon. Friend the Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) to withdraw his Amendment, and allow the Vote to pass.

MR. BIGGAR had not understood that any imputation was cast upon the Medical Staff. The imputation was that the Commander-in-Chief, who had the Medical Staff under his control, had mismanaged in the grossest manner the Forces of England at the Cape.

MR. PARNELL had no wish to put the Committee to the trouble of a Division, especially as the discussion which had taken place would, in his opinion, have a beneficial effect. He felt that the question was an awkward and disagreeable one for the Committee to listen to. It was not until he was charged by several hon. Members with making imputations against the Army Medical Department that he became warm. Although he had not intended that the discussion should travel so far as it had done, he believed it would do great good. As regarded the conduct of affairs in South Africa, he asked leave to withdraw his Amendment.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he had received a letter a day or two ago from one of our soldiers in Durban, who complained very much of the scarcity of medical luxuries in the hospitals. Such matters as milk, butter, &c., were spoken of as having to be paid for out of the pay of the soldiers. Having promised to bring the matter under the notice of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, he took that opportunity of doing so. He was sure that the want of the smallest possible comforts referred to was due to some mistake, and ventured to express a hope that if there had been any shortcomings in that respect they should be remedied.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(4.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £495,200, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for the Pay and Allowances of a Force of Militia, not exceeding 132,526, including 30,000 Militia Reserve, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880."

COLONEL NAGHTEN hoped that the Government would give some assurance that curtailing the training of the Militia was not to be carried further, nor to be adopted as a precedent. Everyone acquainted with that Force was aware that three weeks' training was very little, especially in the case of Artillery, to make any proficiency, in which branch four weeks was but a short time. With regard to the Vote for clothing in the Militia, he wished to know what had become of the head-dresses of the Militia, which, for some reason or other, had been taken away, the men now appearing in forage caps only? He saw no credit allowed for the old busbies, which, however, he supposed were not worth much; but why had they been taken away? Was it to give them to the Volunteers? It would appear that, in taking away the head-dress of the Militia, it was intended to reduce their appearance in the eyes of the other Forces, which was a very great mistake. He must say that the numbers of the men had this year been very much increased where the Militia had been properly treated and quartered in barracks. He trusted that the Committee about to be formed would give considerable attention to the subject of recruiting from the Militia. He could not help thinking that if the recruits of the Army had passed three or four years in the Militia, and had some of their time of service counted towards their pensions, a much finer class of men would come forward for the Regular Service. It was to be hoped that some old Militia colonels would be appointed to the Committee on Army re-organization, on which, he thought, all branches of the Service ought to be represented; and it would be a benefit to the Army at large if Militia colonels were allowed to send to the Regular Service a proportion of their unmarried men up to a certain standard in height and chest measurement.

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER called the attention of the Committee to the very serious deficiency still existing in the numerical strength of the Militia, and could not allow this Vote to pass sub silentio. The Committee would see, at page 5, that the Militia Establishment of all ranks stood at 137,556; whereas the number of those present at the training of 1878 was by the last Return only 86,458, leaving a deficiency of about 51,000 of all ranks. That number did not, however, express the real deficiency in fighting strength; since, besides Militia Reserve men, large deductions must be made, owing to the number who would be on the sick list from the youth of the men, whenever the Militia were called on for service in the field. There were also 14,189 privates absent without leave, from the last training. He would now call attention to the deficiencies existing in particular regiments, as shown by a Return which he held in his hand relating to the training of all Militia regiments in the United Kingdom during last year. In Lancashire, where he was sorry to inform his right hon. and gallant Friend the Secretary of State for War the state of matters was at its worst, there were five regiments returned as having an establishment of 6,000 men in rank and file. Of these, however, only 2,824 appeared at inspection. Two Devonshire regiments showed only 561 out of an establishment of 1,600 rank and file; an Aberdeen regiment—for he was sorry to say Scotland was no better than England in this respect—370 out of 800; the Cornwall Rangers, 331 out of 800; and the East Essex, 390 out of 800. It was, in short, the constant practice for not one-half the nominal numbers of a Militia regiment to appear on parade. The Volunteers were in a different position, for unless two-thirds of a regiment appeared the ordinary inspection could not take place. He was quite aware that the Establishment of the Militia was based on a war footing; but the deficiencies were so serious that he trusted his right hon. and gallant Friend would call upon Militia colonels to spare no exertion in filling up the attenuated ranks of their regiments. If the Militia was to continue to be the so-called Constitutional Force of the country, it was of the utmost importance that steps should be taken to make it numerically efficient. There was only one more point to which he wished to call attention. He rather doubted whether it was wise on the part of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War to reduce the training period of the Militia this year from 27 days to 20, in order to save some £40,000. At all events, he hoped the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would not find it necessary to repeat the experiment. Allowing for the day of assembling, the day of dismissal, and three Sundays, it would be seen that the actual training period this year did not exceed 15 days, which was scarcely sufficient to make the regiments efficient.

LORD ELCHO said, that the Vote for the Militia was by far the most important the Committee had to consider, and with regard to it, he was sorry to say that the state of things was even more serious than his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir Arthur Hayter) had represented. They were always told that the Militia was the backbone, the very soul and essence of our military system. Well, what was the state of this backbone? Why, it was invertebrate; and he would give figures to prove this—figures which he hoped would receive the attention of the country, for it was only with the help of public opinion that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would be able to frame and carry out the necessary measures of improvement. The Militia Establishment was fixed at 136,000 men; but, at present, it only stood at 86,000, so that it was 50,000 short. Deducting from this 86,000 the Militia Reserve, which amounted to 30,000, there remained only a Force of 56,000 of all ranks. Deducting, again, the permanent Staff 4,000, the officers 2,100, and the non-commissioned officers 1,000, there remained only 47,238, which constituted the entire effective Militia Force of the country. His hon. and gallant Friend had shown the weakness of particular regiments. A more convincing proof of their shortcomings might be obtained in a different way. The total number of Militia regiments in England, Ireland, and Scotland, was 158. Now, dividing 47,238 by 158, they would find the result to be 298, which was, therefore, the average strength of our Militia regiments. But the evils of which he complained did not end there. The ages of the men were by no means satisfactory. He found that the "men" under 17 years of age numbered 1,970; and those between 17 and 19, 19,851. The number of those between 19 and 20 was not given, the next list including all between 19 and 25; but, no doubt, those between 19 and 20 formed a very large proportion of the total number. Then, of those over 35 years of age there were 8,261. Altogether, therefore, out of a total nominal strength of 136,000 men of all ranks, there were at least 30,081 who, in Germany, would not be considered efficient for military service. Now, that was a ghastly state of things. If the Militia was the backbone of our military system, and he owned that it ought to be so, he could not understand how the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War could sit down for an hour and allow such a state of things to continue. Whatever he might do, it was to be hoped that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would not carry out the 104th paragraph of the Report of his own Committee of 1876, and reduce the Establishment of the Militia to 75,000 men, on the ground that it could not be kept higher. Such a proceeding would be worse than that of the man who, wishing to lengthen a blanket, cut a piece off one end and sewed it on to the other; for the proposal of this Committee was to lengthen the blanket by cutting a piece off it altogether. For the sake of the dignity and strength of this country, he implored the right hon. and gallant Gentleman not to lose a moment in remedying the terrible shortcomings of our Militia system, as shown in the official Returns.

COLONEL STANLEY confessed that, at first sight, the figures of the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) somewhat appalled him. On a closer examination, however, he found that the noble Lord was mistaken in some important particulars. In pointing out the discrepancy between the strength of the different regiments and the number of men who appeared at inspection, he made no allowance for the men who were at that time actually serving with the Colours. This circumstance accounted at once for 34,000 or 35,000 men. Then, again, the noble Lord in making his comparisons, included the permanent Staff on the one hand, and deducted it on the other, and asked the War Office to account for the difference. Another source of error was this—that the Returns of some regiments did not include recruits, who, in certain regiments, within his own knowledge, numbered 200 or 300. The discrepancies to which the noble Lord had called attention were, therefore, more apparent than real. At the same time, he (Colonel Stanley) was prepared to admit that the state of regiments in the neighbourhood of large towns was not altogether satisfactory. In London, Glasgow, and other great centres, there was a large floating population, and it was impossible to retain a hold upon the men under such circumstances as easily as it could be done in rural districts. The estimated strength of regiments would, he was afraid, always be more or less affected from this cause; but it was satisfactory to know that on an emergency there was very seldom any difficulty in getting men, and that whenever there was a scarcity of civil employment the ranks filled up. The noble Lord had somewhat mis-stated the effect of the paragraph of the Report of the Committee of 1876 to which he had referred. The recommendation had only reference to a technical distinction between the Militia proper and the Militia Reserve who, being liable to be withdrawn, did not form an integral portion of the Militia regiments. What was recommended was a change of form, rather than a change of substance. With regard to the head-dress of the Militia, referred to by the hon. and gallant Member for Bath (Sir Arthur Hayter), he believed the change to the forage cap had, on the whole, been recognized as advantageous to the Service, and satisfactory to the men themselves. The old shako was really very little worn, and a great deal of time was lost in fitting the men with it. Moreover, it was not so serviceable as the forage cap. With regard to the period of training, no one could regret more than himself the curtailment of it which it had been deemed advisable to make. But the necessity for reducing the Votes having arisen, the present year seemed to be unusually favourable for making an experiment of the kind; at all events, it seemed to be an occasion on which the period of training might be reduced without so much detriment to the Service as might, under ordinary circumstances, be expected. No fewer than 25,000 of the men had had not one month's but four months' training with regiments of the Line, and there were also a large number of recruits who had also had the advantage, in most cases, of two or three months' training. The year, altogether, was an exceptional one, and the experiment was not likely to be repeated. He could assure hon. Members who had spoken that the state of the Militia was occupying very closely the attention of the Government. It was difficult to keep up some regiments to their strength amidst the fluctuations of the labour market and other disturbing influences; but instructions had been sent to the General Officers commanding districts to be most careful in selecting men. He hoped that this precaution would have a satisfactory result, and that much of the desertion which took place between the enrolment and the training of the men would be done away with.

Colonel Stanley

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK, while fully recognizing that the strength of the Militia was not what it ought to be, pointed out to the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) that he had fallen into a singular misapprehension on the subject. The Return, which professed to give the total number of men who were in training in 1878, stated that 15,000 were absent without leave and 14,000 absent with leave; but it appeared that the latter number included the Militia Reserve men who came out for mobilization. It was, in the highest degree, creditable to the Reserve men that so large a number of them should have responded to the call to mobilize last year. It had been anticipated that at least 15 per cent would be absent; but it turned out that the absentees scarcely amounted to 2½ per cent, although many of the men were obliged to leave their families in very necessitous circumstances. The training period for the Militia extended from February to September. Different regiments were called out at different times; and it happened that many of the men of the Militia Reserve, who had served with the Colours last year up to July 3, were absent from the Militia regiments which were trained in July, August, and September. Thus, a considerable portion of the discrepancy which the noble Lord had pointed out was satisfactorily accounted for. Notwithstanding the tendency which had been shown to depreciate the Militia, and the unfavourable criticisms which had been passed upon them, even by Volunteer officers, he (Sir Henry Havelock) felt bound to say that they really formed the backbone of the military system in this country, and he trusted that no effort would be spared by the military authorities to increase their efficiency. The mobilization of last year showed most unquestionably that the Militia Reserve was a Force which could be relied upon to a greater extent than had previously been supposed. As regarded the Army Reserve, the anticipations indulged in were never likely to be realized; it was not probable that in 1883 or 1884 we should have more than 42,000 or 43,000 in the Army Reserve at most. There was thus all the more reason for the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to adopt every means in his power to increase the Militia Reserve. The men of that Reserve did not cost more than 30s. each a-year; and they formed, as he had pointed out so long ago as 1876, the most efficient and substantial Reserve we possessed. It was very satisfactory, also, to find that their recent association with the men of the Line, so far from deteriorating their spirit, had improved it. He observed that in one regiment, which had turned out 1,000 strong, there were no fewer than 500 men who had served as Militia Reserve in the Regular troops. He would, therefore, venture to press upon the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War the great importance of increasing the Militia Reserve. If the Militia Reserve had been increased in 1876, they would have had 10,000 more trained men ready to take their places in the ranks in 1878, and the cost of the increase would have been little more than £25 to £30 per man. He would again ask the right hon. and gallant Gentleman not to depreciate the value of the Militia Reserve, but to endeavour to increase it; for, in his opinion, it was the most efficient, the most substantial, and the most economical Reserve they had. He trusted to hear, before very long, that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had taken a step in the direction of increasing it.

LORD ELCHO said, that there was nothing whatever, either on page 35, or on page 5 of the Estimates, to show that the statements he had made, and to which exception had been taken, were wrong. On page 5, he found that the Militia—including permanent Staff and Militia Reserve—out of an Establishment of 137,556 men, had 86,458 men present at training in 1878. Therefore, if to the 86,458 men present at training they added the Militia Reserve, who were apparently included in the cost, the observation he had made was perfectly correct. But he was willing to accept the contradiction which had been made by his right hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Stanley). The fact was, that he had been quoting from one Parliamentary Paper, and the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had referred to another. With the deduction, which must be made, of 30,000 boys and old men, he did not think that the Militia could be considered in a proper state, having an average strength per regiment of something like 300 men. His right hon. and gallant Friend, as Chairman of the Committee upon this subject, stated that he differed in opinion from the officers commanding the regiments of Militia; and he ventured to suggest that, in time of peace, it was not necessary to keep the Militia up to so full an Establishment as at present. To that opinion, he (Lord Elcho) could not assent, for he thought that the Militia ought to be kept up to its full Establishment in time of peace, if it were to be made useful in time of war. The Report went on to say that in time of emergency and danger the Militia could be increased, but that the Establishment in time of peace should be reduced. According to his right hon. and gallant Friend's Report, therefore, he was content to keep the Militia at a low state in time of peace, and to fill up the ranks in time of war. But was that a course which would make the Militia available in time of emergency? It was necessary above all things that the Militia should be well-trained, and able at once on an emergency to take its place in the defences of the country. He ventured to think that his remarks upon this point were not inconsistent with what he had previously said, and what appeared in that Report. He would most respectfully urge upon his right hon. and gallant Friend to take this matter into his very serious consideration.

MR. PARNELL said, that last year he moved an Amendment to reduce this Vote by the sum of £25,000, and he was very glad to see that the Government had that year adopted his suggestion. The Amendment he moved last year was to reduce the item on account of regimental pay and allowances for the Militia by £25,000; and he hoped that the Government would now consent to a further reduction of £25,000 from the Vote. He thought he should be able to show the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War that the further reduction which he proposed was not only expedient, but necessary. He might say that he had listened very carefully to the discussion which had taken place on the Vote, and he considered that the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) was quite right in the criticisms he had made. In 1877, about 30 per cent of the men were absent from the training; and in 1878, about 40 per cent were absent. The sum asked for last year was £534,000 on account of this Vote, although only £483,000 was spent. Thus, about £50,000 more was taken on account of the Vote than was actually required. In the present Estimates a reduction had been made of £25,000, as he had already mentioned; but the Appropriation Account of the Controller and Auditor General last year stated that it was precisely on this item that excessive demands were made. During the years 1876-7, 1877-8, more than £50,000 was asked for by the Government than was actually required. Now that the training of the Militia was to be shortened by seven days in the present year, another good reason for the reduction appeared. The Amendment which he should move was that the regimental pay and allowances for the Militia be reduced by £25,000, in addition to the reduction of £25,000 made by the Government. The Vote was asked for on account of a much larger number of men than would actually come in to be trained. As nearly £50,000 in a year, for the last three or four years, had been asked for on account of this Vote in excess of what was actually required, he thought there was good reason for the reduction. What was the effect of Parliament voting away all this money? The money was really given to the War Office to do what it liked with. No doubt, the surplus was returned to the Exchequer; but the money was in the hands of the War Office to do what it pleased with. He thought they had arrived at a time when the Votes in the Army Estimates should be submitted to a Select Committee of the House of Commons. If that were done, he should be able to show that in almost every Vote a larger sum of money was demanded by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War than he was able to spend, so that he had at all times in his possession a large amount of money not required. That was not the way in which public accounts should be kept; and, unless the right hon. and gallant Gentleman could adjust the Estimates to the Expenditure, the Committee should not be asked to grant sums of money so much in excess of what was spent. During the present year there could be no doubt that at least £30,000 more was asked for than would be spent. He begged to move to reduce the Vote by £25,000 under sub-head A.

Amendment proposed,

"That Sub-head A of £275,000, in respect of Regimental Pay of Militia, be reduced by £25,000."—(Mr. Parnell.)

Question proposed, "That the said Item be so reduced."

COLONEL STANLEY stated that the Estimate submitted was for the amount required for the Service of the year. So far as he was aware, there was no reason which would justify him in consenting to the reduction proposed. Therefore, he hoped that the Committee would grant the Vote.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 8; Noes 190: Majority 182.—(Div. List, No. 120.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(5.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £47,900, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for Yeomanry Cavalry Pay and Allowances, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880."

MAJOR O'BEIRNE said, he had a great objection to the manner in which Cavalry officers had been appointed to adjutancies in the Yeomanry for some years past. Since the present system had come into operation, no doubt, great advantage had been experienced by regiments of Yeomanry in obtaining officers from the Regular Cavalry for adjutants. But he must refer to the very objectionable manner in which those appointments were made. In the first place, an officer under 12 years' service could not be appointed an adjutant of Yeomanry; but, within his knowledge, that rule had been disregarded in the case of particular persons. Every officer who was appointed to the Yeomanry received the usual pay and allowances of an adjutant, and was placed in an exceptionally good position, without being under the necessity of being a single day on foreign service. That gave adjutants of Yeomanry an exceptional advantage over the other officers in the regiments from which they were taken, the latter having to go on foreign service. He thought that no officer should be appointed to an adjutancy of Yeomanry unless he had been on foreign service. Another objection was that no officer who had risen from the ranks was ever appointed an adjutant of Yeomanry. It was a grievance on the part of officers who had risen from the ranks that only half their service was allowed to count towards their pensions, and thus they had to serve 30 years, instead of 20. The Royal Warrant made this distinction between officers who had risen from the ranks and other officers. By Clause 115 of the Royal Warrant, an officer who had risen from the ranks, in case of any permanent disability or incapacity from wounds, or other causes, could not retire on full pay unless he had served 15 years out of 25. He considered that those officers were treated very unjustly; and it was also right that some of those appointments to the Yeomanry should be reserved for officers who had risen from the ranks. The fact was, that there was a great deal of patronage connected with these appointments to adjutancies of Yeomanry; a great deal of county influence was requisite to obtain them. An officer who had risen from the ranks would necessarily not have county influence, and, therefore, he was under a disadvantage in respect to the appointments. He only knew of one officer who had risen from the ranks being made an adjutant of Yeomanry; he was a gentleman from the 7th Dragoon Guards. He found one officer in the Dragoons of only eight years' service; in the Life Guards, two—one of 11, and the other of only 10 years' service. He begged to move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £5,200.

Mr. Parnell

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £42,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for Yeomanry Cavalry Pay and Allowances, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880."—(Major O'Beirne.)

COLONEL STANLEY did not think that the hon. and gallant Gentleman had based his objection to the Vote upon sufficient grounds; and, therefore, the Committee could not be asked to consent to the proposed reduction. By the present system, the Yeomanry obtained a class of men with new ideas, active and able to discharge their duties. Considering that the system worked well, he felt it his duty to oppose the reduction of the Vote.

MR. WHITWELL was sorry that any proposal had been made to reduce the Vote, especially on the grounds put forward by the hon. and gallant Gentleman. The Yeomanry adjutants would this year certainly have to do more work than in any previous year. He did not think the Vote should be reduced in any form whatever.

GENERAL SHUTE agreed with the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War that, under the present system, the adjutants appointed to the Yeomanry were a class of men well up in all the latest changes and improvements in drill, inasmuch as they were fresh from the Cavalry. There could be no doubt that, in consequence of these appointments, the Yeomanry Cavalry had vastly improved.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. PARNELL wished to point out, before the Main Question was put, that although the pay of the men had been reduced by one-sixth because they were to be called out for a short time, the deductions from the pay of absentees were not reduced in like proportion. This was, of course, due to an oversight on the part of those who had charge of the matter; but it was very absurd that such mistakes should occur. The same thing occurred with regard to other items. The command pay was reduced, and they had the items of servants' allowances, £400; troop allowances, £200; and so forth. Why should not these be reduced in the same proportion as other items? Of course, it showed that the Estimates were not drawn up as they ought to be.

COLONEL STANLEY said, the deductions referred to by the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) had not been dealt with, because the members of the corps were not under the control of the War Office.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(6.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £512,400, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for Volunteer Corps Pay and Allowances, which will come in course of payment during the year ending 31st day of March 1880."

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, anyone who looked into this question, which concerned the body of Volunteers now reaching nearly 200,000 in number, of whom about 195,000 were efficient, would deem it necessary, with respect to its usefulness to the country, that the Committee should consider whether any amelioration of the conditions of service of these men could be practically effected. He wished to make one or two observations on the recommendations of Viscount Bury's Commission; and, in the first place, wished to call the attention of his right hon. and gallant Friend the Secretary of State for War to the position of administrative battalions. Now, anyone who was acquainted with the formation of administrative battalions would know how necessary it was, when they were brought into camp, that they should be absolutely under the command of one man, who should have power to punish in the same manner as an officer commanding in his own immediate locality. But at present, in camp, a commanding officer could only admonish and reprimand or place a man in the guard-tent, without being able to dismiss him from his corps. That, certainly, ought to be amended; and, therefore, he wished to ask whether it was the intention that all administrative battalions should be consolidated, and, if not, whether the right hon. and gallant Gentleman intended to give greater powers to commanding officers when the whole battalion was assembled in camp or elsewhere? With regard to the allowances in camp, he could not help thinking that a larger sum should be granted to a body of men like the Volunteers, who went out almost entirely at their own expense. He believed it was recommended that 2s. a-day should be given to every man in camp for four clear days. But that was hardly sufficient. In his opinion, if 2s. were granted with the extra 2s. 6d., it would be a fair allowance for going into camp. He also wished to be informed what was the intention of the Government with regard to the clothing of the Volunteers. Were they to wear the same colour as was worn by the regiments of the sub-district to which they were attached? That was a question he should like answered, as he was quite sure the Volunteers would conform to the wishes of the Government if expressed. Lastly, as to the vexed question of the adjutants. His right hon. and gallant Friend had just said that it was of the utmost importance that the adjutants should be taken from the Cavalry of the Line for the Yeomanry, and that it was far better that men who had grown rusty in that Service should be relieved by younger and more efficient men. If that was good for the Yeomanry it was also good for the Volunteers; and, if so, the old adjutants ought to be placed in the same position as the adjutants of Militia were placed—namely, a certain retiring allowance if they retired by a certain day. As the matter now stood, on the recommendation of Lord Bury's Committee, Volunteer adjutants could not receive the pay and allowances unless they were incapacitated or had served 15 years. He trusted this would be the last time that these complaints were heard. Without pressing the point further, he expressed his opinion that the same allowances ought to have been made to the adjutants of Volunteers as to the adjutants of Militia. He hoped his right hon. and gallant Friend would state what were his intentions with respect to this matter.

Mr. Parnell

MR. A. H. BROWN hoped the case of the Volunteer adjutants would be fully and fairly considered. Without knowing what were the intentions of the Government with regard to the Report of Viscount Bury's Committee, there were many things contained therein to which he objected. The hon. and gallant Baronet (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) had drawn attention to the case of administrative battalions, and had asked whether they were to be further consolidated. There was one recommendation of the Committee which, at first sight, would strike anybody as a very good one; but which he believed could be shown to be impracticable. It was that battalions should be amalgamated. For instance, it would be found that the finances of the battalions were in the hands of the lieutenant-colonel, and it would be impossible to amalgamate battalions one with another when you threw upon the lieutenant-colonels commanding the battalion a responsibility in regard to the finances which would be very heavy. Again, it could be shown that the finances of some corps were not in a satisfactory state. To join these corps to others who were financially sound would be thrown upon the lieutenant-colonels of the amalgamated corps, which he thought they would decline. The Committee, in examining the financial state of the Force, had proceeded to divide their expenses under the heads of "necessary" and "unnecessary." But he thought that hon. Members would agree with him that many expenses had been placed erroneously under the latter head. For instance, he found that the charge for stationery, printing, and carriage of parcels were placed as one of the unnecessary expenses. Again, they had put down as "unnecessary" the expenses of Artillery Corps in connection with gun-practice, such as horse-hire and railway fares, which were necessarily incurred when the men had to go many miles to practice. Therefore, to the financial part of the proposals which had been put forward in the scheme of Viscount Bury he felt bound to demur; while he regarded the other proposals as being very good, and as being well worthy of consideration. He hoped, therefore, the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would be able to inform him which portion of the recommendations contained in the scheme it was intended to carry into effect.

MR. MARK STEWART expressed a wish to hear from the Secretary of State for War the reasons why Artillery Volunteers had not received at the hands of the Government more attention than had hitherto been paid to that branch of the Volunteer Service? It was, in the opinion of many persons, extremely important that more pains should be taken to secure the efficiency of the Artillery. As the Committee was aware, very adequate provision was made at Shoeburyness for the instruction of those Volunteers who were able to go there; but it was impossible that men could come from Scotland, or the Northern parts of England, to receive instruction there in any considerable numbers, when the distance to be travelled and the expense were taken into account. He might mention that within the last two years a camp had been established at Irvine, one of the most accessible towns in the West of Scotland. It was open for four days, and 200 men attended it, not only from Scotland, but from the North of England. The question, however, was how that camp could be maintained; and what was required was that some fund should be provided for the purpose, for while the expenditure of the camp last year amounted to £307, the income was only £203. Its promoters were, therefore, over £100 out of pocket; and it would not, he thought, be wise to allow so useful an institution to collapse for want of the means to carry it on. The sum charged for each man attending the camp for four days was 15s.; travelling expenses, 5s.; total, £1. For an officer, £3 2s.; camp, 10s.; total £3 12s.; while at Shoeburyness, for attending the camp for six days, per man, was 14s. 6d.; travelling expenses, £1 15s.; total £2 9s. 6d. For an officer, £3 10s.; for travelling, £2 10s.; total, £6. What he would ask the Government, under the circumstances, to do was to give a grant of 10s. a-head towards the camp, or even 5s. in addition to Lord Bury's recommendation of 6s. per man to the corps which he belonged towards paying the expenses. In that way the camp might be maintained, and the efficiency of the Volunteers greatly promoted throughout not only Scotland, but the Northern parts of England. It must be recollected how admirably suited Irvine was both for practice and instruction in drill of every description, while at Maryhill a sufficient staff of instructors was always at hand. He wished, also, to point out the necessity which existed for increasing the grant with the view of enabling commanding officers to meet the expenses, which had to be borne for the purposes of drill; for it was impossible that many of them could meet those expenses, unless the funds at their disposal were supplemented by a Government allowance on a larger scale. Again, the Artillery Volunteers were frequently exposed to very severe weather; they had to go through their exercise on the shores of the sea, and they ought, he thought, to be supplied with great coats, under a penalty that if they were not found in a certain condition at the end of a given time, the Volunteers themselves should be liable to make good the deficiency. He could not help adding that Volunteer adjutants seemed to him to be placed in a very disadvantageous position as compared with adjutants in the Militia or the Yeomanry. The Volunteer adjutant, for instance, had no such accommodation as regarded rooms when in barracks as the Militia adjutant; and, instead, only an allowance of 2s. 3d. per day, or 15s. 9d. per week; he had no soldier servant, but an allowance of 1s. per day, or 7s. a-week; and instead of having an allowance of forage for keep of a horse at contract scale, only 1s. 10d. was allowed per day, or 12s. 10d. per week, notwithstanding that he had much more work to do than when employed with his own regiment. The ordinary Volunteer adjutant in an Artillery battalion had to work eight months out of the 12; and he trusted the Government would be able to give the Committee some assurance that their position and that of other adjutants, as, for example, Yeomanry adjutants, who, he was told, lost, by their appointment, £220 a-year, would be looked into, and that their retiring allowance would be placed on a more liberal platform, especially those adjutants who had been a long time in the Service, and that they would be more liberally treated in future.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE said, he thought a very strong case had been made out on behalf of the Volunteer adjutants for the consideration of the Government, and expressed a hope that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would see the expediency of increasing their retiring allowances.

LORD ELCHO wished, as allusion had been made by his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) to the consolidation of administrative battalions, to point out to the authorities at the War Office the necessity of being very careful in dealing with that question. They might proceed in the direction of consolidation until they had succeeded in getting rid of a good deal of the Force. His hon. and gallant Friend had also referred to the clothing of the Volunteers, and had asked whether it was the intention of the Government that it should be altered? Now, he could tell the Committee, of his own knowledge, that there was a strong feeling on the part of many Volunteers that it was desirable the gray uniform should be retained, because they believed it to be more serviceable, and better suited to the Force than a red uniform, which a shower of rain might spoil. Besides, as many hon. Members were aware, gray was the colour which was used in India for service, and which had been chosen by Sir Garnet Wolseley for his troops during the Ashantee War as being the most serviceable. There could be no doubt that, for service in the field, gray was a better colour than red. Probably, a good way of compromising the matter would be that both the Army, Militia, and the Volunteers should have a gray undress and a red full-dress uniform. And when a compulsory change to red was defended on the ground of the enemy otherwise being able to distinguish the Volunteers from the Regular troops, it was manifest that this argument fell to the ground unless the similarity in dress and equipments was complete in all respects. But there was, as he had said, the strongest possible feeling in favour of retaining the gray uniform. It had been suggested that the main difficulty of supplying Volunteers with a uniform of that colour in time of war would be an administrative one; but considering the difficulty which was experienced by Volunteers in times of peace in procuring clothing of any description from the Government Stores, it would be better, in his opinion, that they should rely altogether on private contractors. So great had he found the difficulty to be in his own regiment, that he was obliged to give up resorting to the Army Stores; and he hoped the Government would not press the matter, unless they meant to make the uniformity in clothing complete as between all branches of the Services, and to extend it to such articles as buttons, belts, and lace; it would be useless, he thought, to enforce it merely with regard to the colour of cloth worn. But there was another matter which, in his opinion, was much more important than the question of the colour of the uniform of the Volunteers, although it had not been touched upon in the course of the present discussion—he alluded to the question of drill. As things at present stood, a certain number of drills were required to be gone through by the Volunteer recruits. A Volunteer in the first year of his service was required to do 30 drills, the number being only nine for the subsequent years. It had, however, been recommended by Viscount Bury's Committee that 30 drills should be required in the second year also—that was to say, that there should be 60 drills during the first two years. Now, he would venture to remark that there was such a thing as riding a willing horse too hard. The Volunteer Force, in point of numbers and efficiency, was, at the present moment, in a state which no one believed it would arrive at when the Volunteer movement was first started. It was, in fact, the only decently sound portion of our military system. A good deal had been heard about the Militia; and when the Vote for the Reserves came on, the Committee would be able to understand how we stood with regard to a Reserve Force. He would strongly recommend the Government, therefore, to be careful how they assented to any proposal which would have the effect of impairing the efficiency of the Volunteer Force. He deprecated what he would call trop de zèle in dealing with it. The only thing which the Volunteers had got out of the Committee to which he had referred was the proposal that 30 compulsory drills should be required in the second year; and he was afraid that if that proposal were acted upon the result would be that the numbers of the Force would be diminished, while its efficiency would not be increased. He hoped, therefore, the Government would see the expediency of not pressing that proposal further. But there was another matter which was dealt with in the Report of the Committee, and that was the question of numbers. They wanted to limit the number of Volunteers; but it would not, in his opinion, be advisable to act on that recommendation. When the Militia was in a sound condition, and the Reserve what it ought to be, then the question of limiting the number of Volunteers might very fairly be taken into consideration. But, in the present state of those Services, it would, he could not help thinking, be bad policy to put any limit on the number of our Volunteer Force. Those were the main points on which he deemed it necessary to touch on the present occasion. There was another point, however, on which he desired to make one or two observations. The case of the adjutants had been referred to; and he, for one, was prepared heartily to endorse all that had been said as to the merits of those officers, to whom the Volunteers owed so much. He was bound to say that, under the new system, the Volunteers had been very fortunate, generally speaking, in the adjutants whose services they had secured. As to sergeants, he could only say that it had been found impossible to get good men to fill that position without spending more than the Government allowance, so that it was not fair to describe the expenditure on that score as unnecessary. But there was another point to which he wished particularly to refer before he sat down; it related to sergeant-majors. The question had been raised, whether sergeant-majors were entitled to a pension; and his right hon. and gallant Friend the Secretary of State for War, in replying to that question, had stated that there was no such rank as that of sergeant-major in the Volunteer Force. Power, he said, was given to Volunteer officers to appoint men to perform the duties of sergeant-major; but there was no such title in connection with the Force known to the authorities at the War Office. His right hon. and gallant Friend was, however, mistaken in that respect; for, in accordance with the Warrant of 1863, Article 204, it was laid down that a commanding officer of Volunteers might appoint a sergeant-major; and, again, in the Warrant of 1877, it was set forth that sergeant-majors were to receive the same pension as sergeants. It was clear, therefore, that by Royal Warrant commanding officers were empowered to make such appointments, and that the men so appointed were entitled to pensions. The answer which had been given by his right hon. and gallant Friend was, therefore, not consistent with the facts of the case. Speaking from his own experience as a Volunteer officer, he was glad to be able to bear out the statement that as the services of the adjutants had been found most valuable, so, also, had those of the sergeants and the sergeant-majors; and he fully believed that, under the Warrants to which he referred, there were bona fide sergeant-majors, and that they were entitled to a pension as such.

Mr. Mark Stewart

MR. J. BROWN wished to make a few remarks with respect to the retiring allowances of Volunteer adjutants, who were, in his opinion, a very ill-treated body of men, seeing that, although they had very important and arduous duties to perform, they would hardly receive sufficient in the shape of pension to keep body and soul together. Speaking as an outsider, not belonging to the Volunteer Force, he might say that he had always experienced at the hands of those officers the greatest courtesy and kindness; and he was, therefore, glad to be able to speak a word in their behalf. He had moved for a Return, which he hoped would throw some light on the subject; but it had not, he regretted to say, as yet been laid upon the Table, owing, it was but fair to add, not to any fault of the War Office authorities, but rather to the delay in filling it up on the part of the adjutants themselves, who, perhaps, did not thoroughly understand the matter. The Return would show what was the length of service of these officers; what amount of money they received, in the shape of pension and retiring allowance, from the sale of their commissions, or in any other way under the retirement scheme. But as he was unable to refer for information on those points to the Return, he might be allowed to mention one or two cases with the particulars of which he was acquainted, and which appeared to him to involve considerable hardship. There was one instance in which an officer had served 25 years in the Royal Artillery, and subsequently for 18 years as adjutant of a Volunteer regiment; but after a total service of 43 years, all that he would receive as a retiring allowance would be something like £130 a-year. Those gentlemen had done their duty thoroughly well, and in the most satisfactory manner; but they were placed in a worse position than a captain of the Army with less service. By the Army retirement scheme, a captain retired after 20 years on about £200 a-year. A number of Volunteer adjutants had sold their commissions before becoming adjutants. The amount realized from the sale of their commissions ought not to be taken into account in considering their retiring allowance. It was made out by Mr. Knox before the Volunteer Committee that some of them would receive 13s. a-day retiring allowance, of which 7s. a-day arose from the sale of their commissions, and 6s. a-day only from the proper retiring allowance according to the scale offered. On looking over the Return, he found that 24 Volunteer adjutants had realized nothing by the sale of their commissions; 11 of them had realized £250; 15 had sold out for not more than £450; 29 had obtained sums between £450 and £1,000; but only 16 had realized upwards of £1,000; two had lost £1,000 each. Allowing that they realized this last-mentioned sum of money, it was only sufficient to give them something like 4s. a-day in addition to the retiring allowance proposed. Even adding this to the proposed retiring allowance it would not be sufficient to keep these gentlemen alive; but he did not think that the sums realized by the sale of their commissions should be taken into account, for it was their own money which they only received back. It was very unfair to take into consideration the sum which they realized by the sale of their commissions previously to becoming adjutants. Therefore, the only allowance which was offered on retirement was about 6s. a-day, or £110 per annum, after 30 years' service. They were told that 8s. a-day might be given; but he trusted that the Government would grant them the same retiring allowance as was given to Militia adjutants. That was the least that could be done to a body of men who had proved themselves so valuable, and had done so much for the country and for the Volunteer Force.

SIR HENRY WILMOT wished to state that for a number of years he had held command of a very strong regiment. The uniform was scarlet, and, for eight days, he had taken the regiment into camp in the worst possible weather. They had received no aid from the Regular Forces, but were encamped alone for eight days, performing all military duties, notwithstanding the soaking rain. At the end of the period they were inspected by the late Lieutenant General Lindsay. Before the General left the parade ground he rode up to him, and stated that he could not leave the camp without saying that the men would be a credit to any Service in the world, from their efficiency and for the clean way in which they turned out after the bad weather they had gone through. After that experience of scarlet uniforms, he thought they were under no disadvantage, compared to other colours. He began life as a red soldier; and his experience was that if men knew how to clean their red coats they could keep them in just as good condition as the green or gray uniform. He was sure that if the scarlet uniform of his regiment was changed to gray clothing, they would have the men who had been accustomed to it leave in a short time. He thought that scarlet was the national and proper colour for the uniform.

Lord Elcho

SIR UGHTRED KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH said, that in the borough which he had the honour to represent (Hastings) the Artillery Volunteers had no objection to the recommendation of Viscount Bury's Committee, that every recruit in his second year should do 30 drills. On the other hand, they said that one week at Shoeburyness encamped was more important to them than a whole year's drilling. He would urge upon the Government to give greater encouragement to the Artillery Volunteers to go to Shoeburyness. They ought to be taken to and from the camp, and the cost of their living ought to be allowed them free of charge. These, he considered, were reasonable requests, and showed a very great desire on the part of the Artillery Volunteers to make themselves efficient. Volunteers were quite ready to do the increased number of drills which was required of them; but they were anxious to go into camp and submit to real discipline.

MR. STACPOOLE thought that the Volunteers ought to be clad in scarlet uniforms, like the Line and Militia. It was absurd to say that a red coat soon began to look shabby; he knew the contrary, as he was in a Militia regiment in 1855. He still had his old red coat, which was now as good as when he first had it, and it certainly went through some very wet weather at the Curragh, and other places. He hoped that the House would pass a Resolution that all the Volunteers should be clad in scarlet; for he thought that it would be very much better for all branches of the Service to be dressed in the same manner. A red coat was darker at night than any other colour; he had often been in a scarlet coat at night, and he was sure that it looked very much darker than any other colour would do. He also hoped that the Government would take into serious consideration the position of the adjutants, and would place them in the same situation as the Militia adjutants.

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER did not think there was any proposition in the Report of the Committee which was so much disliked by commanding officers of Volunteer regiments in London as the proposed amalgamation of corps. In the first place, the Volunteer regiments in London were, as a rule, much too large for amalgamation; and, in the second place, they were separated from each other by a wide demarcation of classes. It would be quite impossible, for instance, to amalgamate an East End with a West End corps, nor would the lawyers, the Civil Service, and the artists amalgamate with working men's corps. He was certain that if this plan were adopted it would be destructive, in many cases, to entire regiments. The Committee stated, in its Report, that the first saving which would be made would be with regard to drill halls and rifle ranges. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War must know that, so far as rifle ranges were concerned, a number of large corps now used the same rifle range. Hardly any London regiment had the sole use of a rifle range. With regard to drill halls, they would be very glad to share one, for their regiment had none, and he knew of no London regiment possessing one. The only saving that would be made by amalgamation would be in the cost of head-quarters; but it would be very much better that this expense should be borne by the separate corps, than to effect it at the cost both of the comfort and numbers of the regiments united. With regard to the Volunteer camp allowance, he trusted that his right hon. and gallant Friend would recommend an increased allowance to those Volunteers which had already gone into camp this year. At Whitsuntide nearly 300 of his corps went into camp.

They were now to have 10s. 6d. travelling expenses per man as a maximum, and 2s. a-day for the six days spent in camp. He did not agree with what had been said as to a limitation of the numbers of the Volunteers; indeed, it seemed to him somewhat invidious to refuse to accept additional Volunteers in the present state of the Force. Within the last 15 years the Volunteers had increased by 80,000 men; and, according to that ratio, the maximum would not be reached for seven years to come. He thought it would be better to postpone fixing the limit until the proposed number was much more nearly reached. The question of dress had been a great deal discussed, and he did not wish to go into the point; because he presumed that a rifle regiment like the one which he had the honour to command would be allowed to remain in the same uniform as the Rifle Brigade, to which it was attached. One proposal had been made which seemed to him to be a very good one, and that was, that water bottles and great coats, to the extent of one water bottle and great coat to one-fourth of the number of the Volunteers, might be kept in store, and issued to the Volunteers when they went into camp. Of course, if they gave Volunteers great coats there was no security that they would not use them for other than military purposes. Lastly, as to the old adjutants, it was surely unfair that there should be any discrepancy between the adjutants of Militia and Volunteers, and that the former should receive a pension of 10s. a-day, while a Volunteer adjutant should only be able to earn 8s. a-day. If a man was to retire upon 8s. a-day he would have £140 as a maximum; and could they expect a man in receipt of £240 and other allowances to retire and accept a pension of £140 a-year? If the Government would grant Volunteer adjutants the same retiring allowance as was made to adjutants of Militia—namely, 10s. a-day, it would, according to the evidence offered, give full satisfaction to all. There was one point to which he hoped his right hon. and gallant Friend would turn his attention—namely, as to whether some badge or medal for long service could not be given to Volunteers, now that the Force had reached its 20th year of service? At present, an old Volunteer had nothing to distinguish him from a raw recruit; and it was hard that he should not receive some badge, such as was given in the Regular Army to men of long service and good conduct. He thought that some honorary rank should also be given to retired lieutenant colonels and majors. It would cost nothing to the country, and would be very acceptable to the Volunteer Service, which was growing and increasing both in numbers and efficiency every year.

COLONEL LOYD LINDSAY would reply to the remarks which had been made by hon. Members upon this subject. Questions had been touched upon which were before the Committee appointed, as hon. Gentlemen knew, by his right hon. and gallant Friend's Predecessor, to inquire into the requirements and wants of the Volunteer Force, and to say whether it was necessary to do anything, either by increasing the capitation allowance to the Volunteer Force, or by other means, to increase its efficiency and contentment. The Committee went into that inquiry with every desire to do ample justice to the Volunteer Force, and if they saw their way fairly and honestly to recommend an increase of the allowance in order that the Force, to whose patriotism and utility everyone so readily acquiesced in bearing testimony, might be maintained in its present state of efficiency. In the course of their inquiry the Committee sent out certain questions, which were answered throughout the whole of the Force. They asked, amongst other things, upon what most of the Volunteers expected their capitation grant? Very soon the Committee were able to divide the classes of expenditure under different heads; they classed certain expenses necessary, and certain other items they put amongst unnecessary expenses. His noble Friend the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho), and one or two other hon. Members, laid some blame on that mode of classification, alleging that the Committee had put down some matters as unnecessary which were, in reality, necessary. Amongst those things was mentioned the extra pay given to Staff sergeants. It did seem wrong, at first sight, that the Volunteers should give extra pay to their Staff sergeants; no one objected to their doing so; but he did not think they should do it out of the capitation grant. The Regulations laid down that a certain sum should be paid to Staff sergeants. That amount was calculated at the War Office on the same scale as the Militia pay for Staff sergeants, and it ought to be sufficient. If they gave Staff sergeants more than the Regulation allowance, they would be making better terms for themselves at the expense of the rest of the Service. They might do that out of their own pockets; but they were not entitled to come to Government and say—"Give us more capitation grant, in order that we may be able to give better terms to Volunteer sergeants than are given to Militia sergeants." If the matter were looked at in that light, it would be seen that it was not a case which required an increased grant. With respect to the extra stationery allowance, if anything further was necessary, it fell under the head of "unnecessary expenses," as a sufficient amount was now allowed. With regard to clothing, he was glad to see that some hon. Members who had addressed the Committee during the latter part of the discussion were more in favour of a scarlet uniform than those who spoke first. He would say at once that the Government was in favour of clothing the Volunteers in scarlet. The view which they took of this question was this—a similarity of dress was most desirable throughout the Force; at present, as was well known, a great variety of dress and costumes were worn in the Volunteer Force. If the Volunteers were called out, one of the very first things which would have to be done would be to put an end to the great variety of costumes, and to consider what would be the best clothing for the Volunteers. That was one way of looking at the matter; and, at the present time, when they had no great emergency, they ought to decide what was the best uniform for the Volunteers. If it were left until an emergency was upon them, there would be great difficulty in the matter. It was essential that they should determine upon a good and useful dress for the Volunteer Force; and, having determined upon it, they should do their best reasonably—he did not say forcibly—to induce the Volunteers to adopt it. The matter had been carefully considered and discussed at the War Office by his right hon. and gallant Friend the Secretary of State for War and those who advised him; and what seemed to them the best proposal was to say that a scarlet uniform should be the dress for Volunteers, and that the facings should be similar to the facings of the county regiment or district to which the Volunteers were attached. The Metropolitan Volunteers would be attached for drill and exercise to battalions of the Guards. They did not wish to carry their theory to such an extent as to dishearten old-established regiments, who were now dressed in gray or green; and, therefore, they did not wish to say to them—"You shall absolutely conform to the red uniform;" but they would say—"We strongly recommend it." They would say to them—"That is the dress which we think you should adopt; but if you wish to continue your old uniform, there is no objection to your retaining it." They also proposed that the Volunteers who chose to conform to what the Government said was the Regulation dress, should have certain advantages by being able to draw their clothing from the Government Depôt, and by paying for it by deductions from the capitation grant. That would be a great saving to the Volunteers, for they had to pay their tailors large sums of money to obtain long credit. The Government would give to those regiments conforming to the Regulation dress the advantage of being able to draw their clothing from the Government Stores. He could not agree with the strictures which had been passed with regard to red uniforms, for he thought they were a most useful dress; if a man knew how to use it, he could keep his red coat quite as clean as any other coat. He thought his noble Friend was most ungrateful, when he said—"We have asked you for bread, and you have given us a stone." If his noble Friend would look at and read the recommendations of the Committee with regard to camps, he thought he would see that a very distinct advantage had been granted to the Volunteers, and that it was one which would be of great value to them. Of course, some Volunteers did not want to go into camp; and if they did not go into camp they must not want an additional grant. The proposal which was made was most handsome and substantial; it was to give 2s. per head per day to the Volunteers going into camp, on the condition that they spent not less than three days in camp. Thus, every man who spent six days in camp would earn 12s.

Sir Arthur Hayter

—an enormous sum—and he was almost afraid they could not afford it. If large numbers of Volunteers went into camp it would amount to a very large sum, and he thought that it would be well not to allow more than a certain number of men to go into camp. At all events, this was a most substantial advantage; and it had this in its favour—that it was paying money to the Volunteers who would make themselves more efficient than heretofore. That was the principle upon which they went to pay for efficiency—a little more efficiency and a little more pay. With regard to adjutants, nobody could wish better to those very deserving officers, the adjutants of Volunteers, than he did. They had performed a very heavy and a very arduous task, and had done it extremely well, and were fully deserving of all the consideration which could be shown to them. With that view, the War Office proposed, with the sanction of the Treasury, to apply to them an increased retiring allowance—a substantial increase in the allowance from what they formerly had. He must make this remark—that he did not consider that these adjutants of Volunteers should be placed in a better position than officers retiring from the Army. If exceptional advantages were given to them there would be dissatisfaction, for all officers would wish to retire on the same scale. It had been suggested that the same retiring allowance should be given to them as was now given to adjutants of Militia. He did not think that all the conditions that accompanied that allowance had been mentioned to the Committee. The terms upon which adjutants of Militia retired were—that within three months they must make up their minds whether or not they would take it; if they did not make up their minds within that time they had to fall back upon a less liberal allowance. It was proposed to give Volunteer adjutants an allowance which they could take up at their leisure. A man who had served 15 years might wish to serve for longer, and retire upon a more liberal scale. If these recommendations were adopted, he thought that Volunteer adjutants would be thoroughly satisfied with the scale of allowance offered them. Some remarks had been made with regard to the additional drills which the Committee had recommended for Volunteers. He did not know that these drills would be imposed as a matter of regulation; and it was for that House to consider how many drills a Volunteer ought to perform. Many Volunteers in the country did a great many more drills than they were bound to do. It was by no means a high amount of drills which was now required from the Volunteers, and they should squeeze them to the utmost they could. It was most distinctly his opinion that it was necessary to make Volunteers as efficient as possible. When they came to ask for more money they should be made to do increased work. It was quite right that the country should make the best bargain with them possible. There were many Volunteers who were not what they ought to be in the matter of efficiency, and it was quite right to impose some more drills upon them. He held that it was quite a reasonable demand, when they were going to spend £25,000 or £50,000 a-year more upon the Volunteer Force, that they should say—"We require more efficiency." As the Volunteers were willing to work the demand was only reasonable. Volunteers, like other people, were all the better for a little coercion. In past years, whenever they had put heavier and more stringent terms upon the Volunteers, to their credit be it said, they had in every case risen up to them. Judging by that, they ought to presume the same in the future. He did not say that anything should be done to check the Force; he should be very sorry to do anything to check the Volunteer Force. The more exercise and the more drills that were imposed upon them the better it would be for them. With regard to consolidation, that seemed to him to be one of the most important questions with regard to the Force. There was a certain number of battalions which had to maintain rifle ranges, and drill sheds, and headquarters, and various things of that sort; and it was quite obvious that while the burden was borne by a small number of men it came much heavier than if it were borne by a large number. In Edinburgh there was a Volunteer corps well known to his noble Friend the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho), which spent no more money than it obtained from Government. Being a strong regiment, it was able to keep within the capitation grant. If they cut these small regiments up, and made them into a strong regiment, they also would be able to keep within the capitation grant. In that way both efficiency and economy would be promoted. That was the direction in which they ought to go. He did not want to violently drive the corps into a condition from which they would not stir; for it should be remembered that a Volunteer could leave the Force at 14 days' notice. With regard to amalgamation, he thought that ought to be insisted upon. There were some regiments in a peculiar condition of command which did not give them the complete position of regiments. Corps were part of what were called administrative battalions; and he thought that these ought to be distinctly consolidated into regiments. That was quite a different thing from joining two distinct corps together. Administrative battalions, if consolidated, would make one complete regiment; and hon. Members would see that great advantages would accrue from that taking place. In some cases, these administrative battalions were composed of six or seven companies, and each of those different companies was an independent command, and that could not be right. Each of these companies, being an independent command, had a separate commanding officer, who was in the same position as a commanding officer of a regiment to those under his command. He believed that there were about 130 battalions in this state; and he thought they ought not to be allowed to continue in that condition. Those administrative battalions ought to be consolidated, and great advantage would be experienced by the change. If hon. Members would look into the matter, he was sure that they would find that many advantages would be gained by this plan. It was the desire of the Government to do this in the interests of the Volunteer Force; and he hoped that all who took an interest in the Force would rather favour these reforms than set their minds against them. As regarded Artillery Volunteers, he might state that his right hon. and gallant Friend the Secretary of State for War had caused inquiries to be made to ascertain whether suitable sites could not be found for a School of Instruction for them. When that had been done, Artillery Volunteers from the North of England would be enabled to go into camp without having to go down to the South for their instruction.

Colonel Lloyd Lindsay

Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN was sure that the Committee must have heard with very great interest the speech of his hon. and gallant Friend. He wished to know, however, whether the views which the hon. and gallant Gentleman had put forward were only the proposals of the Committee, or whether they expressed the decision of the Government? In his observations, he passed from speaking in one capacity into another. The House, and the country, and the Volunteers wished to know what parts of the Report of the Committee the Government was going to adopt, and what action they were going to take upon it? He would take the matters in their order. And, first, with regard to the organization of the Volunteers. Were the Government going to consolidate administrative battalions? He agreed in thinking that that was a thing which ought to be done gently and carefully. It was a common thing to say that the whole of our Army was a delicate machine; but no part of it was so delicate as the Volunteer Force. If any attempt was made to force the Volunteers they would melt under their hands. He agreed that in many cases consolidated battalions would be an advantage; but to enforce consolidation would be in some cases fatal. Although administrative battalions had many disadvantages, yet, in many parts of the country, if they put an end to the organization of the administrative battalions, the whole regiment would melt away. With respect to the question of adjutants, he was not a very strong advocate of their claims, though he thought that it might be advisable in the public interest that they should have an increased retiring allowance. He should like to know whether he rightly understood that the War Office had determined to give this increased allowance, and that the Treasury had assented and agreed to its being done? That was a matter of importance, which ought to be cleared up by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War. The same thing might be said with regard to the allowance for going into camp—he listened very carefully, and he did not understand whether an additional allowance for going into camp had actually been decided upon and approved by the Treasury. For his own part, he entirely approved of an increased allowance being given. The Volunteers had done so well that they ought not to grudge them any money which they might require for any useful purpose. Then he came to the much disputed question of the colour of the clothing. Had the Government determined upon the course which his hon. and gallant Friend had stated—that scarlet, as the national colour, should be the recognized colour of the uniform for all Volunteers in all cases, except where the Regular regiment belonging to the district was otherwise clothed; and that all corps which preferred other colours were to be put at a disadvantage in having to pay for their own clothing, instead of getting it at a cheaper rate from the Government? He was not going to express a strong opinion in favour of one colour or another. He thought both ought to be allowed to continue, and that individual localities should suit their own tastes in the matter. He must, however, demur to one expression of an hon. and gallant Gentleman with regard to scarlet. The hon. and gallant Gentleman seemed to think that scarlet was the national colour. As he understood it, that was a popular delusion; the original national colour of the English Army was a drabish grey. A buff grey was the colour in which Marlborough's victories were won—scarlet was only the livery of the House of Hanover, which was adopted when that House came to the Throne. Still, undoubtedly, scarlet had been consecrated by subsequent victories. He thought, therefore, that there was no reason to call one colour more national than the other. There were advantages on the side of gray which scarlet did not possess; but scarlet, on the other hand, had its advantages. The matter was, however, of a very delicate nature, for it was very dangerous to try to force any corps into a particular colour of uniform. He would like to hear from his right hon. and gallant Friend what decision the Government had really come to with regard to the whole question, and how far they might accept the statement which they had listened to with so much interest from the hon. and gallant Member for Berks as the decision of the Government upon the points in question.

SIR THOMAS ACLAND stated that he had served for 40 years in the Volunteer Force, and for 20 years had been colonel of an administrative battalion. He was not prepared to say that there was any distinct advantage from consolidating administrative battalions into a regiment. On the other hand, he thought there was considerable advantage in the present system, by its taking off the shoulders of the commanding officer of the administrative battalion much of the unpopularity which would attach to a command. No doubt, to a certain extent, there was something to be said for a consolidated system; but with a very large experience of the kind of corps in question, he had no hesitation in warning the Government to be very careful before interfering with them. He had paid very great attention to this matter, and he had worked up the regulations upon the subject with very great care. And he had considerable practical experience as to the mode in which the present system worked. Under the present system, the commanders of the different corps forming an administrative battalion in agricultural districts might be bank managers, or country gentlemen, or other persons of reputation in the district in which their corps was situated, and it was essential that their authority should be maintained in the districts in which they resided. He thought that the position of a colonel of an administrative battalion was far stronger under the present system than it would be if such a corps was consolidated into a regiment. If anything went wrong at the present time, the commandant of one of the corps forming the battalion reported the matter to the colonel in command of the battalion; and if it were of sufficient importance, the colonel reported it to the Under Secretary of State; and his authority by that system was far stronger than it would be if he had the details of discipline before him in the case of every individual corps. That was the result of his experience; and he thought that the position of the colonels of administrative battalions was better at the present time than it would be if a change were made in the direction of consolidation. With regard to the subject of clothing, he did not wish to enter into it. But he would urge upon the Government to remember one thing, and that was, that as soon as a man was off parade he ought to have nothing to do but to brush his clothes and to put them away; if a man had to clean up his uniform with pipeclay, and take a great deal of time in so doing, it would be very unfair to busy men who had but a short time to give to their military duties. He believed that the Government would act wisely, if they made administrative battalions a little better off in the matter of clothing. At the present time, the captains commanding small corps were very much pressed by the claims of tradesmen; and if the colonel of a battalion had a little more authority in keeping the clothing in good order, very good service to the Force would be done.

Mr. Campbell-Bannerman

COLONEL STANLEY said, that after the very clear explanation which his hon. and gallant Friend had been good enough to make, it was hardly necessary for him to enter into the matter at any length. He had been asked questions, however, upon one or two points which he should like to reply to. He had been asked whether his hon. and gallant Friend had simply expressed his own opinion as a Member of the Committee, or whether what he said was the opinion of the Government? In many instances, there might be a great identity between his hon. and gallant Friend's replies in the two capacities. But, on some points, he spoke with some reserve. Notwithstanding that, he felt strongly for the necessity for an increased allowance in respect of camps. Although the War Office was strongly in favour of giving an increased allowance, the matter had not yet finally received the decision of his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. But he hoped, however, that the matter would be received by him in the same conciliatory spirit in which other proposals laid before him were received. With regard to consolidation, that was a matter in which they had proceeded tentatively and carefully. They did not doubt that consolidation of small corps would be an advantage; but, on the other hand, the experience of his hon. and gallant Friend had induced him to pause in consideration of the practical difficulties which attended consolidation. It was far from their wish, where difficulties were in the way which could not be easily overcome, to press consolidation to the point of endangering the existence of corps. In the same way, as regarded clothing, their course was clear. Scarlet had been accepted for some time past as the national dress of the Service, taking the Service generally; and they agreed with the opinion of Sir Garnet Wolseley, when Instructor General of the Artillery Forces, that red was the most desirable colour to be adopted by the Service, as a whole. To say that there was no feeling against the adoption of that colour, he would point out that in the Report of a Volunteer Committee it was stated that already 91 regiments had adopted scarlet, against 66 regiments in green and 67 in gray. Thus, scarlet appeared to be the dress which was most in favour with the Volunteer branch of the Service. Many persons conversant with these matters stated that many corps were merely held back from adopting scarlet with a view to see what would be done before they made the change; but that they had had it in contemplation to adopt scarlet. The only rule they intended to lay down was that where a corps intended to change its dress, then the change should be to red. But where a case occurred in which a corps was unwilling to change its uniform to scarlet, then they were willing to receive the expression of their wishes, and to deal with the matter in a spirit of consideration. At the same time, he wished it to be clearly understood, as regarded the matter of scarlet uniform, that it was desirable to adopt this rule, that in the case of red clothing only should facilities from the Clothing Department be given. It was impossible to put the Clothing Department of the Army in a position to supply any description of clothing which the Volunteers might choose to adopt. As respected the camp allowance, their intention was to apply to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer for permission to include in the Estimates a larger camp allowance than was now given. He was afraid that it would be impossible to make that increased allowance retrospective, as was proposed. It would be impossible to say that they should make a Warrant of this description retrospective. He thought that those who came under the Warrant must be content to accept the benefit given by it as they found it; and he did not think that they could expect to have it ante-dated. He hoped he had made it clear that it was desired to give the increased allowance in respect of camps; and he had every hope that that desire would be carried into effect. Under these circumstances, he trusted that after the discussion which had taken place the Committee would pass the Vote, and that then they should report Progress.

MR. WHITWELL inquired whether any resolution had been come to with regard to limiting the numbers of the Volunteers?

COLONEL STANLEY said, that, as regarded the increase of numbers, they did not at present intend to exceed the number which the Committee put as the maximum. If the Force continued to increase in the same ratio as it had done for the last five years, it would increase yearly, at a cost to the country at something like the expense of a battalion of Infantry. Whereas, in 1873-4, the Force cost £414,000, the expenditure on account of it now amounted to £512,000. He did not object to the increased expenditure; but, at the same time, he could not help saying that there was a point at which an expenditure of this kind ought to be very carefully considered. There was another point which he ought to mention. At the present time, an establishment of Volunteer corps contained a number of supernumeraries. It was a custom that where a certain number of these had been got together an application should be made for forming them into an extra company or battery. It was proposed in the future to deal with applications of that kind at a certain period of the year; in that way it was proposed to grant the applications in respect of the better corps, and to refuse them in the case of less good corps.

Question put, and agreed to.

House resumed.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

Committee to sit again upon Wednesday.

CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE

BILL.—[BILL 150.]

(Mr. Raikes, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson.)

CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

MR. RYLANDS inquired when it was intended to take the third reading of the

Colonel Stanley

Bill? He had a Motion with regard to the Military Expenditure in South Africa, which he intended to bring on in connection with this Bill.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that if it was intended, on the third reading of this Bill, to raise a question on the Expenditure in South Africa, the third reading must be fixed at some future day; but when he could not at that moment say.

Bill, as amended, considered.

Bill to be read the third time To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

INDIAN MARINE BILL.—[BILL 182.]

(Mr. Edward Stanhope, Mr. John G. Talbot.)

SECOND READING. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [19th May], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. ONSLOW objected to the Bill being read a second time, inasmuch as he had asked the Under Secretary of State for India whether a Committee could not be appointed to consider the expenditure upon the Indian Marine? The Marine expenditure was increasing very much in India, and money was not only spent upon it, but also upon the Royal Navy. He thought that the expenditure upon the Indian Marine and upon the Royal Navy performing duty in Indian waters should be considered before this Bill was passed. If his hon. Friend could give an assurance that there was not to be a double expenditure in respect to the Navy in India, and that an Indian Marine was required to do the same duties that the Royal Navy was now paid for performing, he should have no objection to the Bill passing. But, as the matter at present stood, this Bill seriously affected the finances of India.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, that this Bill raised no question of finance at all. The Bill was only for the purpose of enabling discipline to be enforced upon such part of the Indian Marine as it was found necessary to employ in addition to the Royal Navy. He would propose an Amendment to strike some words from the Preamble of the Bill, which he thought would meet the objections which his hon. Friend had made. He should be very glad for inquiry to be made into this matter; and he thought it might be shown that not a single farthing of expense in India was incurred by this Bill.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

INCLOSURE PROVISIONAL ORDER
(MALTBY LANDS) BILL.—[BILL 31.]
(Sir Matthew Ridley, Mr. Assheton Cross.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. MUNDELLA asked his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary to consent to the discharge of this Order. The right hon. Gentleman had agreed that if the matter were not passed before that time he would discharge the Order in respect of it; and he now trusted the right hon. Gentleman would do so. They had now arrived at a point at which the Bill should be left to the Standing Orders. A Select Committee had made a special Report with respect to this Bill, which made it impossible for it to pass that Session; and he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary would now consent to allow the Order for the second reading to be discharged.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS regretted extremely that, owing to a Notice being placed on the Paper, the Bill was then prevented from being proceeded with by reason of the operation of the 12 o'clock Rule. The parties in the matter had gone to a great deal of expense, and yet had not had an opportunity of bringing their views before the House. If the Amendment had not been put upon the Paper they would have been enabled to state their case; and he had no doubt that a decision would have been come to, either for or against their view. This was the last day, apparently, on which the Bill could be taken, so as to comply with the Standing Orders of the other House; but he knew of one case where a Bill not so far advanced was taken. In the absence of his Colleague, he did not think that he could permit the Order in this matter to be discharged.

Second Reading deferred till Thursday.

SALMON FISHERY LAW AMENDMENT
(No. 2) BILL.—[BILL 188.]

(Colonel Kingscote, Sir Joseph Bailey, Mr. Stafford Howard.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Colonel Kingscote.)

COLONEL KINGSCOTE said, that this was a very simple Bill, and was founded upon the Report of the Government Inspectors, made in 1877. It embodied the views of those officials in respect of doing away with a close time weekly, and extending it to an equivalent period in May and December. It only related to tidal waters—in fact, was local—fisheries in the Severn being only affected. He might state that most of the proprietors of the upper waters were in favour of it.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

MOTION.

CONVICT "THEODORIDI."

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

MR. CALLAN moved,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Copies of any Memorial presented by or on behalf of the Convict 'Theodoridi:'"

"Of any Correspondence with respect to 'Theodoridi,' or Memorandum of any representations made on behalf of the Convict:"

"And, of usual form, printed or lithographed, sent to the Judge who tried any convict on whose behalf any memorial may have been presented or representation made for his opinion."

In making the Motion, he might say that it was as much for the convenience of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary as for his own that he moved for these Returns.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Copies of any Memorial presented by or on behalf of the Convict 'Theodoridi:'"

"Of any Correspondence with respect to 'Theodoridi,' or Memorandum of any representations made on behalf of the Convict:"

"And, of usual form, printed or lithographed, sent to the Judge who tried any convict on whose behalf any memorial may have been presented or representation made for his opinion."

—(Mr. Callan.)

MR. ISAAC objected to the proposal.

MR. CALLAN said, that he could see no objection to the information for which he had asked being furnished, as it was necessary for the House to know the facts of the matter fully before it could come to any decision on the subject. It was his intention to bring the subject before the House at no very distant date.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that he had already stated to the hon. Member privately, as he would now state to the House, that he had practically no Memorials or Papers which he could lay before the House. There had been no Papers or Memorials of any sort or kind which were suitable for laying before the House. He had already stated all the circumstances in connection with this case. As he had said, there was a difference between the case of Theodoridi and of the man who was convicted with him; and the difference was this—that in the case of Theodoridi the prosecutrix recommended him to mercy. In releasing this man, he did it only on condition that he should leave the country for good; and on condition that if the annoyance of which he had been guilty was repeated, he should again be brought before the Court—it was solely upon condition of his leaving the country and ceasing the annoyance, that Theodoridi was released at the request of the Turkish Ambassador. He thought that there had been some misapprehension with regard to this case, and that some of the lady's friends had thought that the fact of Theodoridi's being released had something to do with her. So far as the lady was concerned, however, there ought not to be the slightest idea entertained that the release of the convict had anything to do with her. From some letters having been mentioned in an earlier part of the case, he had some idea that they had better be given up, or they might be produced at some future time. But on his demanding them, as a condition of Theodoridi's release, he was assured that there were no such letters in existence. He had thought it right to ask the Treasury Solicitor whether there were any letters in the custody of Theodoridi which it might be desirable to get. The Treasury Solicitor said he did not think that Theodoridi had any letters; and unless he had had that assurance he should never have assented to his release. He wished to make it clear to the lady's friends, however, that he did not attach any importance to those letters; but only desired that anything in the custody of the convict might be given up, in order to prevent any annoyance at a future period. Nothing was further from his intention than to give any pain to the lady or her friends, or to convey the slightest imputation upon her.

MR. MONK asked, whether he understood the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary to state that he had no Papers which he could lay upon the Table of the House? There was a strong feeling out-of-doors, originating with the Press, against this man Theodoridi being released, while his companion in crime, who was, perhaps, less guilty than he was, had been retained in prison. If the Turkish Ambassador probably not only called upon the right hon. Gentleman, but had communications with him, he thought that they should be laid upon the Table of the House; for, although Theodoridi was a stranger to this country, and of a different religion to the English people, that was not sufficient reason for his release. He should like to have some further information upon this matter—more particularly as to his right hon. Friend's reason for refusing to place upon the Table of the House such Papers as he had received upon the matter.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that he had now stated to the House nothing but what he had said on previous occasions when questions were put to him with regard to this matter. There were no documents in relation to this convict which he should be justified in laying before the House. The only Papers relating to it were some letters which were private. The distinction between the case of Theodoridi and his fellow-convict was, that the lady who prosecuted in his case recommended him to mercy. The condition of his release was, as he had stated, that he should leave the country and never come back again, and should cease any annoyance; whereas no such assurance had been given by the other man.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

House adjourned at a quarter after Two o'clock.

INDEX

TO

HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

VOLUME CCXLVI.

FOURTH VOLUME OF SESSION 1879.

EXPLANATION OF THE ABBREVIATIONS.

In Bills, Read 1^o, 2^o, 3^o, or 1^a, 2^a, 3^a, Read the First, Second, or Third Time.—In Speeches, 1R., 2R., 3R., Speech delivered on the First, Second, or Third Reading.—Amendt., Amendment.—Res., Resolution.—Comm., Committee.—Re-Comm., Re-Committal.—Rep., Report.—Consid., Consideration.—Adj., Adjournment or Adjourned.—cl., Clause.—add. cl., Additional Clause.—neg., Negatived.—M. Q., Main Question.—O. Q., Original Question.—O. M., Original Motion.—P. Q., Previous Question.—s. p., Report Progress.—A., Ayes.—N., Noes.—M., Majority.—1st. Div., 2nd. Div., First or Second Division.—l., Lords.—c., Commons.

When in this Index a * is added to the Reading of a Bill, it indicates that no Debate took place upon that stage of the measure.

When in the Text or in the Index a Speech is marked thus *, it indicates that the Speech is reprinted from a Pamphlet or some authorized Report.

When in the Index a † is prefixed to a Name or an Office (the Member having accepted or vacated office during the Session) and to Subjects of Debate thereunder, it indicates that the Speeches on those Subjects were delivered in the speaker's private or official character, as the case may be.

Some subjects of debate have been classified under the following "General Headings:"—
ARMY—NAVY—INDIA—IRELAND—SCOTLAND—PARLIAMENT—POOR LAW—POST OFFICE—METROPOLIS—CHURCH OF ENGLAND—EDUCATION—CRIMINAL LAW—LAW AND JUSTICE—TAXATION, under WAYS AND MEANS.

ABERDARE, Lord
Children's Dangerous Performances, 2R. 1112; Comm. 1407
Disqualification by Medical Relief, Comm. Amendt. 1339, 1340
Metropolitan Water Supply and Fire Brigade, Report of Select Committee, Motion for Papers, 1122, 1128
Omnibus Regulation, Comm. 1406
Prosecution of Offences, 2R. 1336
Racecourses (Metropolis), 2R. 116

ACLAND, Sir T. D., Devonshire, N.
Army Estimates—Medical Establishments, &c. 1964
Volunteer Corps, 2023
Law of Distress, Res. 76

VOL. CCXLVI. [THIRD SERIES.]

ADVOCATE, The Lord (Right Hon. W. WATSON), Glasgow, &c. Universities
Scotland—Miscellaneous Questions
Church of Scotland—Return of Communicants, 1702
Education Act—Barvas (Island of Lewis) School Board, 1234
Parliamentary Elections—Haddington Burghs, 1233
Religious Disturbances at Dundee, 693
Uncertificated Legal Practitioners, 232
Supply—Local Taxation in Scotland, 189, 193
Registrar General's Office, Scotland, 178, 179
Valuation of Lands and Assessments (Scotland), Comm. 733, 784, 785; add. cl. 788

3 U

Afghanistan

Expenses of Military Operations—Incidence of Expenditure, Petition presented (Mr. Gladstone) May 26, 1226

The War

Execution of Prisoners of War, Questions, Mr. O'Donnell; Answers, Mr. E. Stanhope May 9, 18

The Peace Negotiations, Observation, Viscount Cranbrook May 19, 656;—Bases of Peace, Observation, The Chancellor of the Exchequer May 19, 698; Observation, Viscount Cranbrook May 26, 1204;—Signature of a Treaty of Peace, Observations, The Chancellor of the Exchequer May 26, 1266

General Roberts' Despatch—Capture of the Peiwar Kotal, Questions, General Shute; Answers, Mr. E. Stanhope May 12, 122; May 26, 1233

Afghanistan and Zululand—Number of British Troops Engaged, Question, Mr. Waddy; Answer, Colonel Stanley May 19, 699

Africa—South AfricaLEADS—*Natal and the Transvaal

Appointment of Sir Garnet Wolseley as High Commissioner, Statement, The Earl of Beaconsfield; Question, The Earl of Kimberley; Answer, The Earl of Beaconsfield May 26, 1204; Questions, Observations, The Earl of Carnarvon; Reply, Earl Cadogan; Question, The Earl of Kimberley; Answer, Earl Cadogan May 27, 1329

The Zulu War

The Latest Telegrams, Observation, Earl Cadogan May 12, 100

Re-inforcements, Question, Lord Truro; Answer, Viscount Bury May 15, 381;—Condition of the Regiments, Observations, Lord Truro, Viscount Hardinge; Reply, Viscount Bury; short debate thereon May 19, 666

Africa—South AfricaCOMMONS—*Papers and Despatches

The Latest Telegram, Observation, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach May 12, 133

Negotiations with the Boers—Sir Bartle Frere's Despatch, Question, Mr. W. E. Forster; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach May 19, 698

Lord Chelmsford's Despatches, Question, Sir Alexander Gordon; Answer, Colonel Stanley May 23, 1139

Further Papers, Questions, The Marquess of Hartington, Mr. Chamberlain; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer May 26, 1240

Sir Bartle Frere's Despatches, Question, Mr. Courtney; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach May 27, 1364; Observations, Mr. Sullivan; Debate thereon May 27, 1364; Question, Mr. Courtney; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach June 10, 1919

[cont.]

Africa—South Africa—COMMONS—cont.Re-inforcements

Drafts from Regiments, Question, Mr. Otway; Answer, Colonel Stanley May 22, 1018

The Royal Marines, Questions, Mr. Otway, Mr. Rylands, Sir Charles W. Dilke; Answers, Mr. W. H. Smith, Colonel Stanley May 22, 1018

Re-inforcements from India, Question, Mr. Rylands; Answer, Colonel Stanley May 23, 1141

The Transvaal

Questions, Sir George Campbell; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer May 13, 234; Notice of Amendment to Motion, Mr. O'Donnell; Observation, Mr. Speaker May 26, 1265

The Zulu War

The Fight at Rorke's Drift, Question, Mr. Staurope; Answer, Colonel Stanley June 16, 1916;—Surgeon Major Reynolds, Question, Mr. Errington; Answer, Colonel Loyd Lindsay May 12, 123

Expenses of Military Operations—Estimates of Expenditure, Question, Mr. Childers; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer May 15, 399; Question, Mr. Whitwell; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer May 15, 401; Question, Sir George Campbell; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer May 26, 1237; Questions, Mr. Childers, Sir George Campbell; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer June 12, 1695

Transport Service in Natal, Questions, Mr. W. H. James; Answers, Colonel Stanley May 20, 838

The Forces in Zululand, Questions, Mr. Waddy; Answer, Colonel Stanley May 22, 1008

Alleged Cruelties of the British Troops, Questions, Mr. O'Donnell; Answers, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach May 22, 1015; June 12, 1706

The Civil and Military Commands, Statement, The Chancellor of the Exchequer, Question, Mr. W. E. Forster May 26, 1227; Explanation, Sir Robert Peel May 26, 1241

Returns of Killed, &c., Question, Sir Wilfrid Lawson; Answer, Colonel Stanley May 27, 1362

Instructions of Sir Garnet Wolseley, Question, Mr. Sullivan; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer May 27, 1357; Questions, Mr. Parnell; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer June 10, 1562; June 12, 1721

The War, Question, Mr. O'Donnell; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach May 27, 1363

Overtures of Peace, Question, Mr. Sullivan; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach May 26, 1235; Question, Sir Wilfrid Lawson; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach June 13, 1810;—Detention of Messengers, Question, Sir Wilfrid Lawson; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach June 9, 1432

MISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

Railways, Question, Colonel Beaumont; Answer, Colonel Loyd Lindsay May 12, 131

Indenture of Natives in Natal, Question, Mr. O'Donnell; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach May 22, 1016

[cont.]

Africa—South Africa—COMMONS—cont.

State of Affairs, Questions, Sir Robert Peel, Sir Julian Goldsmid; Answers, Colonel Stanley June 10, 1882

Slave Trade in South Africa—Treaty with Portugal, Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, Mr. Bourke June 12, 1703

Africa (West Coast)

Sierra Leone Customs Duties, Question, Mr. A. M'Arthur; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach June 12, 1899

Treaties with Native Chiefs, Question, Mr. Ashbury; Answer, Mr. Bourke May 26, 1233

AGNEW, Mr. R. Vans, Wigton Co.

Hypothec Abolition (Scotland), Consid. 650, 1403

Agricultural Statistics—The Corn Returns

Question, Mr. Clare Read; Answer, Viscount Sandon May 26, 1227

AIRLIE, Earl of

Racecourses (Metropolis), 2R. 116

ALEXANDER, Colonel C., Ayrshire, S.

Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 32, 447, 450, 453; cl. 40, 590; cl. 44, 850, 1569, 1575

Army Estimates—Military Law, Administration of, 1942, 1948

America, South—Chili and Peru—The Hostilities

Question, Mr. A. Mills; Answer, Mr. Bourke May 19, 695

ANDERSON, Mr. G., Glasgow

Africa, South—Slave Trade—Treaty with Portugal, 1703

Criminal Code (Indictable Offences)—Repeal of Statutes, 1238

Illegal Lotteries, 1810

Malta—Maltese Civil Service, 1013

ANNESLEY, Earl of

Tenant Right (Ireland), 2R. 811

ANSTRUTHER, Sir W. C., Lanarkshire, S.

Valuation of Lands and Assessments (Scotland), Comm. add. cl. 737

ARBUTHNOT, Colonel G., Hereford

Army—Miscellaneous Questions

First-Class Army Reserve—Volunteers, 1811

Military Pensions—Royal Warrants, 1877, 1878, 398

Veterinary Warrant of May 1st, 1878, 1007

Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 32, 443

Army Estimates—Military Law—Administration of, 1926

ARGYLL, Duke of

Foreign Policy of Her Majesty's Government, 380, 508, 530, 539, 556, 560

India—Telegraphic Communication with India, Address for Papers, 920

Landed Estates Court (Ireland), Motion for Returns, 664

Tenant Right (Ireland), 2R. 807, 809

ARMY

MISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

Army Medical Service—Invalided Medical Officers, Question, Mr. Gourley; Answer, Colonel Stanley June 12, 1697

Army—Military Pensions—Royal Warrants, 1877, 1878, Question, Colonel Arbuthnot; Answer, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson May 15, 398

Army Organization—The Departmental Committee, Question, Observations, Lord Truro; Reply, The Lord Chancellor May 30, 1416; Question, Mr. Gourley; Answer, Colonel Stanley June 10, 1551; Observations, Mr. Gourley; short debate thereon June 10, 1553; Question, Observations, Lord Truro; Reply, Viscount Bury; short debate thereon June 16, 1901

Army Regulation Act—Cashiered Purchase Officers, Question, General Shute; Answer, Colonel Stanley June 13, 1807

Balances of Deceased Soldiers, Question, Major O'Beirne; Answer, Colonel Stanley May 22, 1006

Beards, Question, Mr. Stacpoole; Answer, Colonel Stanley June 16, 1916

Civil Employment for Discharged Soldiers, Question, Sir Henry Havelock; Answer, Colonel Stanley May 23, 1010

Commissariat and Transport Departments—Re-organization, Question, Sir Henry Havelock; Answer, Colonel Stanley May 9, 12

Compulsory Retirement—The Royal Warrant of May, 1878, Question, Mr. Stacpoole; Answer, Colonel Stanley June 12, 1707

Court of Inquiry at Netley in 1873, Questions, Sir Alexander Gordon; Answers, Colonel Stanley May 20, 837

First-Class Army Reserve—Volunteers, Question, Colonel Mure; Answer, Colonel Stanley May 22, 1012; Question, Colonel Arbuthnot; Answer, Colonel Stanley June 13, 1811

Flogging in the Army—1st Dragoon Guards, Question, Mr. Hopwood; Answer, Colonel Stanley May 20, 836

National Fund for Relief of Families of Soldiers, Sailors, &c., Question, General Shute; Answer, Colonel Stanley June 13, 1806

Regimental Commands—The Five Years' Rule, Question, Major Nolan; Answer, Colonel Stanley May 22, 1010

Soldiers in Uniform, Observations, Colonel Mure; Reply, Colonel Stanley; Observations, Sir Walter B. Barttelot June 13, 1808

The 42nd Regiment (Cyprus), Questions, Mr. H. Samuelson; Answers, Colonel Stanley June 16, 1015

The 58th Regiment—Foreign Service, Question, Mr. Wheelhouse; Answer, Colonel Stanley May 19, 694

The 88th Regiment—Volunteers, Questions, Sir Henry Havelock; Answer, Colonel Stanley May 22, 1011

ARMY—cont.

The Warrant of August 13, 1877—Supersession of General Officers, Question, Colonel North; Answer, Mr. E. Stanhope May 23, 1138

The Zulu War—The 60th Rifles—Court Martial, Question, Mr. French; Answer, Colonel Loyd Lindsay May 12, 123; Questions, Mr. French; Answers, Colonel Stanley May 13, 234; May 15, 402

Veterinary Warrant of May 1, 1878, Question, Colonel Arbuthnot; Answer, Colonel Stanley May 22, 1007

Volunteering from the Militia to the Line, Question, Colonel Mure; Answer, Colonel Stanley May 13, 239

Army—Brigade Depot Centres

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for a Return showing for what number of troops the barracks at each 'Brigade Depot Centre' throughout the United Kingdom are at present constructed or in course of construction" (The Earl of Galloway) May 12, 119; Motion withdrawn

Army—The Brigade Depot System

Moved to resolve—"1. That the military system of brigade depôts or sub-districts introduced in the year 1873 has proved a source of expense to this country incommensurate with its general results, and that steps should therefore be taken for their gradual absorption or diminution in number

"2. That the present state of our military organization is a source of immediate anxiety quite irrespective of the extreme youth of the regular forces of the Army occasioned by enlistment for short service; and that in view of the various reports on the subject of the several Committees already appointed by successive Secretaries of State for War, this House hears with concern the intimation that Her Majesty's Government are unprepared with any remedial measures without the preliminary investigation of a further additional Committee" (The Earl of Galloway) May 26, 1205; after short debate, Motion withdrawn

Army—The Condition of the Army and the Short-Service System

Address for Papers (Lord Strathnairn) May 30, 1418; after short debate, Motion amended, and agreed to

Army Discipline and Regulation Bill

(Mr. Secretary Stanley, Mr. Secretary Cross, Mr. William Henry Smith, The Judge Advocate General)

c. Billenting, &c., Question, Major Nolan; Answer, Colonel Stanley May 9, 17

Committee—r.p. May 15, 407 [Bill 88]

Committee—r.p. May 16, 571

Order for Committee read; Moved, "That this House will, upon Tuesday next at Two of the clock, resolve itself into the said Committee" (Colonel Stanley) May 16, 649; after short debate, Question put; A. 92, N. 15; M. 77 (D. L. 100)

Committee—r.p. May 20, 840

Army Discipline and Regulation Bill—cont.

Questions, Major O'Beirne, Sir Henry Have-lock; Answers, Colonel Stanley June 10, 1550

Committee—r.p. June 10, 1563

Legislation as to Booty of War, Question, General Shute; Answer, Colonel Stanley June 12, 1701

Artizans' Dwellings Act, 1868—Private Burying Grounds

Question, Mr. Waddy; Answer, Mr. Ascheton Cross June 12, 1721

ASHBURY, Mr. J. L., Brighton

Africa (West Coast)—Treaties with Native Chiefs, 1233

Assessed Rates Act Amendment Bill

(Earl Stanhope)

l. Royal Assent May 23 [42 Vid. c. 10]

ASSETON, Mr. R., Clitheroe

Hours of Polling (Boroughs), 2R. Amendt. 1660, 1663

ATTORNEY GENERAL, The (Sir J. HOLKER), Preston

Common Law Procedure and Judicature Acts Amendment, 2R. 1202

Criminal Code (Indictable Offences)—Repeal of Statutes, 1239;—Report of the Commissioners, 1719;—Memorandum of the Lord Chief Justice, 1915

Customs and Inland Revenue, Comm. cl. 15, 1519, 1521, 1525, 1531, 1537

Debtors Act (1869) Amendment, 1719

Great Seal, 2R. 790

Patents—Patents for Inventions Bill, 1906

Spirits, Leave, 1541

Supply—County Courts, 702

Land Registry, 703, 711

Supreme Court of Judicature Acts Amendment, Comm. 1541

BALFOUR, Major-General Sir G., Kincardineshire

Africa, South—Zulu War, 1385

Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 30, 428; cl. 31, 435; cl. 32, 447; cl. 36,

Amendt. 464, 472; cl. 38, 573, 576; cl. 40, 591; cl. 41, 602; cl. 42, 605, 606, 607, 652; cl. 44, 859, 863, 866, 874

India Famine Commission, 125

Law of Distress, Res. 65

Parliament—Business of the House, 19

Persia—Retirement of the British Minister, 685

Public Works Loans Commissioners, Report, 402

Supply—Fishery Board in Scotland, &c. 159, 173, 174

Land Registry, 705

P'olice, Counties and Boroughs (Great Britain), 740

[cont.

[cont.

BALFOUR, Major General Sir G.—cont.

Police Courts of London and Sheerness, 722
Registrar General's Office, England, 136
Registrar General's Office, Scotland, 178, 179
Stationery, &c. 147
Works and Public Buildings Office, 150

BALFOUR, Mr. A. J., Hertford

India—East India Revenue Accounts—Financial Statement, Comm. 1784

Bankers' Books (Evidence) Bill

(The Lord Selborne)

l. Royal Assent May 23 [42 Vict. c. 11]

Banking and Joint Stock Companies

(No. 2) Bill (Dr. Cameron, Sir Andrew Lusk, Mr. Hopwood, Mr. Earp)

c. Considered in Committee; Resolution agreed to, and reported; Bill ordered; read 1^o May 9 [Bill 168]

Bankruptcy (Scotland) Bill

(Dr. Cameron, Mr. Baxter, Mr. Mackintosh, Mr. M'Laren, Mr. Ramsay)

c. Bill withdrawn * June 11 [Bill 59]

BARCLAY, Mr. J. W., Forfarshire

Hypothec Abolition (Scotland), Consid. 1404
Law of Distress, Res. 60
Probate, Legacy, and Succession Duties, Res. 912
Railway Commission—Prolongation of Powers, 569
Supply—Fishery Board in Scotland, &c. 170
Local Taxation in Scotland, Amendt. 180, 191, 192
Prison Commissioners for Scotland, &c. 1485, 1487, 1489
Queen's and Lord Treasurer's Remembrancer in Exchequer, Scotland, 157
Register House, Edinburgh, 1484
Stationery, &c. 142, 148, 149
Valuation of Lands and Assessments (Scotland), Comm. 784

BARING, Mr. T. C., Essex, S.

Indian Marine, 2R. 793

BARNE, Colonel F. St. John N., Suffolk, E.

Law of Distress, 400

Barristers (Ireland) Bill (Mr. Callan, Mr.

Patrick Martin, Mr. King-Harman)

c. Ordered; read 1^o May 23 [Bill 194]

BARTTELOT, Colonel Sir W. B., Sussex, W.

Army—Soldiers in Uniform, 1872
Army Estimates—Medical Establishments, 1982, 1983

Volunteer Corps, 2003

Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 30, 419; cl. 32, 445; cl. 42, 605; cl. 44, 873, 1577

Brewers' Licences, Motion for a Select Committee, 640

Law of Distress, Res. 75, 82

Summary Jurisdiction, Comm. cl. 5, 88; cl. 8, 89; cl. 16, 95; cl. 22, Motion for reporting Progress, 99; cl. 54, 220; Schedule 1, 224

Supply—Broadmoor Criminal Lunatic Asylum, 1452, 1457

Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, &c. 210

Land Registry, 706

Prisons in England and Wales, 1270

BASS, Mr. M. T., Derby Bo.

Debtors Act (1869) Amendment, 1719

BAXTER, Right Hon. W. E., Montrose, &c.

India—Return of Ecclesiastical Salaries, 1430

Post Office—Australian Colonies—Conveyance of Mails, 397

Probate, Legacy, and Succession Duties, Res. 916

Railways—Railway Accidents—Adoption of Continuous Brakes, 1832

Treaty of Berlin—The Balkan Garrisons, 127

BEACH, Right Hon. Sir M. E. HICKS—(Secretary of State for the Colonies), Gloucestershire, E.

Africa, South—Miscellaneous Questions

Civil and Military Commands, Explanation, 1261, 1262, 1265

Natal—Indenture of Natives, 1016

Sir Bartle Frere, 1364

Transvaal, 1363, 1919

Africa, South—Zulu War—Miscellaneous Questions

1385

Alleged Cruelties, 1016, 1708, 1715

Negotiations with the Boers, 698

Peace, Overtures of, 1236, 1810;—Detention of Messengers, 1433

Telegram, 133

Africa—West Coast—Sierra Leone—Customs Duties, 1699

Ceylon—Food Scarcity, 1700

Fiji—Execution of Native Prisoners—Alleged Barbarities, 1235

Malta—Maltese Civil Service, 1013

Victoria—Constitutional Question, 1914

West Indies—Jamaica—Coolies, 1913

BEACONSFIELD, Earl of (First Lord of the Treasury)

Africa, South—Natal and Transvaal—Appointment of Sir Garnet Wolseley as High Commissioner, 1204, 1205

Cathedral Statutes, 2R. 387

[cont.]

BEACONSFIELD, Earl of—cont.

- Children's Dangerous Performances, Comm. 1408
- Church of England—Chapter of York Cathedral—Case of the Rev. J. Flemming, 1889
- Foreign Policy of Her Majesty's Government, 380, 536, 539, 553
- Parliament—Whitsuntide Recess, 381
- State of the Country—Depression of Trade, 816

BEAUCHAMP, Earl (Lord Steward of the Household)

- Children's Dangerous Performances, 2R. 1112; Comm. 1407
- Criminal Law—Catherine Churchill, Execution of, at Taunton—Admission of the Press, 1414
- Habitual Drunkards, Comm. cl. 2, Amendt. 389; cl. 3, 390
- Metropolitan Water Supply and Fire Brigade, Report of Select Committee, Motion for Papers, 1121
- Omnibus Regulation, Comm. 1406

BEAUMONT, Colonel F. E. B., Durham, S.

- Africa, South—Zulu War—Railways, 131

Belfast Water Bill (by Order)

- c. Considered May 16, 566

BELL, Mr. I. L., Hartlepool

- Army Estimates—Medical Establishments, 1976
- Noxious Gases, 2R. 647
- Supply—Land Registry, 711

BELMORE, Earl of

- Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878—American Pigs, 1406
- Tenant Right (Ireland), 2R. 795

BENTINCK, Right Hon. G. A. F. Cavendish (Judge Advocate General), *Whitehaven

- Army Estimates—Military Law, Administration of, 1927, 1945

BENTINCK, Mr. G. W. P., Norfolk, W.

- Railways—Railway Accidents—Adoption of Continuous Brakes, 1867
- Trade, State of—Statement of the Prime Minister, 1020

BERESFORD, Lord C. W. D., *Waterford Co.

- University Education (Ireland), Leave, 494

BERESFORD, Colonel F. M., Southwark

- Hours of Polling (Boroughs), 2R. 1685
- Navy—Coaling at St. Vincent's, 1914
- Thames River (Prevention of Floods), Consid. Amendt. 826, 835; 3R. 1134, 1135

BIGGAR, Mr. J. G., Cavan Co.

- Africa, South—Zulu War—Alleged Cruelties of the British Army, 1711
- Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 44, 1591
- Army Estimates—Medical Establishments, &c. 1959, 1960, 1965, 1990
- Navy—Mr. John Clare, Case of, 1872
- Prisons (Ireland)—Religious Denominations, 1809
- Supply—Court of Bankruptcy in Ireland, 1515, 1516
- Courts of Law and Justice, Scotland, 1470
- Prison Commissioners for Scotland, &c. Amendt. 1500, 1503, 1505, 1508, 1509, 1510
- Reformatory, Industrial, &c. Schools, Amendt. 1437, 1439, 1443, 1448
- Register House, Edinburgh, 1481

Bills of Sale (Ireland) Bill

(Mr. Meldon, Mr. O'Shaughnessy)

- c. Committee *; Report May 13 [Bill 45]
- Considered * June 16

BIRLEY, Mr. H., Manchester

- India—East India Revenue Accounts—Financial Statement, Comm. 1082

BLENNERHASSETT, Mr. R. P., Kerry

- Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) (No. 2), 2R. 365
- Law of Distress, Res. 20

Blind and Deaf-Mute Children (Education) Bill (Mr. Wheelhouse, Sir Andrew Lusk, Mr. Scott, Mr. Isaac, Mr. Benjamin Williams)

- c. Consideration, as amended, deferred May 12, 226 [Bill 93]
- Observations, Mr. Monk, Mr. Slater-Booth May 15, 403

BOURKE, Hon. R. (Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs), *Lynn Regis

- Africa, South—Slave Trade—Treaty with Portugal, 1704
- Africa (West Coast)—Treaties with Native Chiefs, 1233
- America, South—Chili and Peru—Hostilities, 695
- Borneo, Northern—Cession of Land, &c. 1699, 1911
- Canada, Dominion of—Fortune Bay, Newfoundland, 12
- Customs and Inland Revenue, 2R. 777, 781, 782
- Cyprus, Island of—Miscellaneous Questions Administration of the Island, 1550
- Ordinances of the Legislative Council, 399, 1360, 1909
- Punishment of Priests, 1809
- Revenue and Expenditure Accounts, 1706
- Egypt—Miscellaneous Questions Financial Changes—Dismissal of Mr. Rivers Wilson and M. de Blignières, 236
- French and English Governments, 1361
- Vivian, Mr.—The Papers, 1913, 1914

[cont.]

BOURKE, Hon. R.—cont.

France, Commercial Treaty with, 18, 1238
 Demonetisation of Silver, 1721
 Greece—Cyprus—Papers, 1360, 1361, 1433
 Italy—Italian Police, 1549
 Samoan Islands, 400
 Spain—Labour in Cuba, 125
 Supply—Stationery, &c. 145
 Treaty of Berlin—Miscellaneous Questions
 Balkan Garrisons, 128
 Eastern Roumelia, 10
 Greek Frontier, 15, 16
 23rd Article, 1431
 Turkey—Anti-Slave Trade Treaty, 1238
 Consul Blunt's Report, 1362

BOWYER, Sir G., Wexford Co.

Supply—Convict Establishments in England
 and the Colonies, 753
 Land Registry, 715

BRAND, Right Hon. H. B. W., (see SPEAKER, The)

Brewers' Licences

Amendt. on Committee of Supply May 16, To leave out from "That," and add "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the nature and incidence of the Tax upon Brewers' Licences" (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) v., 616; Question proposed, "That the words,
 &c.;" after debate, Question put; A. 115,
 N. 53; M. 62 (D. L. 99)

BRIGHT, Right Hon. J., Birmingham

Customs and Inland Revenue, 2R. 781
 East India Revenue Accounts, Petitions presented, 1723
 "General Statistical Abstract" — Foreign
 Tariffs on British Produce, 1140
 India—East India Revenue Accounts—Financial Statement, Comm. 1188

BRIGHT, Mr. J., Manchester

Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 44, 1602
 Summary Jurisdiction, Comm. cl. 10, 93

BRISE, Colonel S. B. RUGGLES-, Essex, E.

Customs and Inland Revenue, Comm. cl. 15, 1528

BRISTOWE, Mr. S. B., Newark

Supply—Stationery, &c. 137, 138

BROOKS, Mr. M., Dublin

Post Office (Ireland)—Telegraph Clerks, 121
 Public Health (Ireland) Act—Loans for Paving
 Works in Dublin, 1135

BROWN, Mr. A. H., Wenlock

Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 31,
 435; cl. 36, 463; cl. 42, 852; cl. 44, 1583
 Army Estimates—Volunteer Corps, 2004
 Parliament—Business of the House, 840
 Public Health Act (1875) Amendment, Comm.
cl. 3, Amendt. 1326; add. cl. ib., 1327

BROWN, Mr. J. C., Horsham

Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 43, 856
 Army Estimates—Volunteer Corps, 2011

BRUEN, Mr. H., Carlow Co.

Dispensaries (Ireland), Comm. cl. 6, Amendt.
 650
 Law of Distress, Res. 67
 Supply—Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Household, &c. 206

BUCCLEUCH, Duke of

Army—Brigade Depot System, Res. 1222, 1225

BULWER, Mr. J. R., Ipswich

Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 31,
 434; cl. 32, 457; cl. 36, 470

BURT, Mr. T., Morpeth

Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act,
 1875—"Besetting," 1007
 Mines Regulation Act, 1872—Inspection of Coal Mines, 1808

BURY, Viscount (Under Secretary of State for War)

Africa, South—Zulu War—Re-inforcements,
 381;—Condition of the Regiments, 670
 Army—Army Organization—Departmental
 Committee, 1902
 Army—Brigade Depot Centres, Address for a Return, 119
 Army—Brigade Depot System, Res. 1220, 1224
 Army—Condition of the Army and Short Service System, Address for Papers, 1421, 1425

CADOGAN, Earl (Under Secretary of State for the Colonies)

Africa, South—Natal and the Transvaal—Appointment of Sir Garnet Wolseley as High Commissioner, 1330, 1331
 Zulu War—Telegrams, 100
 Spain—Contraband at Gibraltar—Case of the "Rosslyn," 1899
 Straits Settlements, Administrator of the—Sultan of Johore, Motion for Papers, 1346

CAIRNS, Earl (see CHANCELLOR, The Lord)

CALLAN, Mr. P., Dundalk

Army Estimates—Military Law, Administration of, 1941, 1944, 1947
 Common Law Procedure and Judicature Acts
 Amendment, Comm. 1804
 Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions
 Cookstown—Forcible Dispersion of a Meeting, 1916, 1918
 Intoxicating Liquors, 1201
 Netterville Trust Property—The Louth
 Institution, 1153
 Poor Law—Monaghan Board of Guardians, 1358, 1359, 1431, 1432

CALLAN, Mr. P.—cont.

- Religious Disturbances at Omev Island, County Galway, 699, 690
- Ribandism, 1229, 1230, 1356
- Parliament—Business of the House, 1434, 1813
- Supply—Court of Bankruptcy in Ireland, 1513, 1516
- Criminal Prosecutions, &c. in Ireland, 1511, 1512
- Prison Commissioners for Scotland, &c. 1503, 1509
- Prisons in England and Wales, 1292
- Theodoridi, The Convict, Motion for an Address, 2030, 2031

CAMBRIDGE, Duke of (Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief)

- Africa, South—Zulu War—Re-inforcements—Condition of the Regiments, 676
- Army—Condition of the Army and Short Service System, Address for Papers, 1422, 1425

CAMERON, Dr. C., Glasgow

- Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1870—Foreign Sheep, 13
- Education (Scotland) Act, 1878—Examination of High Class Schools, 1013
- Hours of Polling (Boroughs), 2R. 1675
- Parliament—Order of Business, 699
- Supply—Local Taxation in Scotland, 185, 189
- Register House, Edinburgh, 1475

CAMPBELL, Lord

- Treaty of Berlin—Article 22—Occupation of Bulgaria and Eastern Roumelia, Motion for Correspondence, 655, 664

CAMPBELL, Sir G., Kirkcaldy, &c.

- Africa, South—(Expenses of Military Operations)—Estimate of Expenditure, 1237, 1697
- The Transvaal, 234, 235
- Army Organization—Departmental Committee, 1059
- East India (Loan), Comm. 1199; Report, 1325, 1399; 2R. Motion for Adjournment, 1803, 1804
- Hypothec Abolition (Scotland), Consid. 1402
- India—East India Revenue Accounts—Financial Statement, 238; Comm. Motion for Adjournment, 1093, 1160, 1797
- Metropolis (Little Coram Street, Bloomsbury, Wells Street, Poplar, and Great Peter Street, Westminster,) Improvement Provisional Orders Confirmation, Comm. 1400
- Metropolis—Local Taxation, Motion for a Select Committee, 1826
- Post Office—Eastern Mail Contract, 1702
- Supply—Local Taxation in Scotland, 189
- Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, &c. 196; Amendt. 201
- Prisons in England and Wales, 1312
- Reformatory, Industrial, &c. Schools, 1436, 1446
- Treaty of Berlin—Article 23, 396, 1430
- University Education (Ireland), 2R. Amendt. 934, 1003

CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Mr. H., Stirling, &c.

- Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 32, 444
- Army Estimates—Military Law, Administration of, 1926
- Volunteer Corps, 2022
- India—Village "Panchayets" or Courts of Arbitration, 835

CAMPERDOWN, Earl of

- Admiralty—Naval Department, 1350
- Metropolitan Water Supply and Fire Brigade, Report of Select Committee, Motion for Papers, 1127
- Parliament—Standing Orders Nos. 95 and 96, 1129

Canada, Dominion of—Fortune Bay, Newfoundland

- Question, Mr. Macdonald; Answer, Mr. Bourke May 9, 12

CANTERBURY, Archbishop of

- Cathedral Statutes, 2R. 384

CARDWELL, Viscount

- Africa, South—Zulu War—Re-inforcements—Condition of the Regiments, 684
- Army—Army Organization—Departmental Committee, 1907
- Army—Brigade Depot System, Res. 1223
- Army—Condition of the Army and Short Service System, Address for Papers, 1423

CARLINGFORD, Lord

- Tenant Right (Ireland), 2R. 805

CARLISLE, Bishop of

- Cathedral Statutes, 2R. 381, 388
- Habitual Drunkards, Comm. cl. 6, 390

CARNARVON, Earl of

- Africa, South—Natal and the Transvaal—Appointment of Sir Garnet Wolseley as High Commissioner, 1329
- China—Ch-foo Convention, 1
- India—Bombay, Disturbances in, 794
- Straits Settlements, Administrator of the—Sultan of Johore, Motion for Papers, 1347

CARTWRIGHT, Mr. W. C., Oxfordshire

- France—Prolongation of the Treaty of Commerce, 1238
- Treaty of Berlin—Greek Frontier, 14

Cathedral Statutes Bill [H.L.]

(The Lord Bishop of Carlisle)

- l. Bill withdrawn, after short debate May 15, 381 (No. 4)

CAVENDISH, Lord F. C., Yorkshire, W.R., N. Div.

- Supply—Criminal Prosecutions—Sheriffs' Expenses, &c. 700

Ceylon—Food Scarcity

Question, Mr. Potter; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach June 12, 1700

CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. J., Birmingham

Africa, South, and Egypt—Papers, 1240
Africa, South—Civil and Military Commands, Explanation, 1243
Zulu War, 1377
Customs and Inland Revenue, Comm. cl. 23, 1877, 1879, 1890
Education Department—Birmingham Board Schools, 126, 127
Hours of Polling (Boroughs), 2R. 1650, 1663, 1694
Local Finance—Annual Statement—Public Works Loan Bill, 1910
Parliamentary Reporting, Select Committee on—The Report, 836, 1239
Post Office (Telegraph Department)—Female Clerks, 1230
Supply—Metropolitan Police, &c. Amendt. 725, 726
Police Courts of London and Sheerness, Amendt. 716
Public Works Loan Commission, &c. 136
Stationery, &c. 137

CHANCELLOR, The LORD (Earl CAIRNS)

Army—Army Organization—The Committee, 1417
Army—Condition of the Army and Short Service System, Address for Papers, 1425
Habitual Drunkards, Comm. cl. 3, 389
Parliament—Standing Orders Nos. 95 and 96, 1129, 1131
Prosecution of Offences, 2R. 1335
Statute Law Revision (Ireland), 2R. 1133
Tenant Right (Ireland), 2R. 804, 808
West Donegal Railway, Comm. 1333
Workmen's Compensation, 2R. 119

CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER (Right Hon. Sir S. H. NORTHCOTE), Devon, N.

Africa, South—Civil and Military Commands, 1227;—Explanation, 1241, 1244, 1251, 1252
The Transvaal, 234, 235
Africa, South—Zulu War—Miscellaneous Questions
1381, 1382, 1384
Alleged Cruelties of the British Troops, 1711
Expense, 399, 402, 1237, 1696, 1697
Papers, 1240
Sir Garnet Wolesley, Instructions of, 1357, 1563, 1721
Annual Financial Statement, 1698, 1909, 1910
Army—Army Organization—Departmental Committee, 1560
Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 36, 472, 474
Army Estimates—Medical Establishments, &c. 1985, 1989
Brewers' Licences, Motion for a Select Committee, 628
Customs and Inland Revenue, 19; Comm. cl. 15, 1533, 1540; cl. 23, 1876, 1879, 1880; cl. 25, 1883; add. cl. 1885, 1886; Consid. 2028

CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER—cont.

Cyprus—Administration of the Government, 1354, 1355
New Coinage, 1705
Dispensaries (Ireland), Comm. cl. 6, 651
East India (Duties on Cotton Goods), Government of India Act, 1858, 233
East India (Loan), Report, 1325, 1400; 2R. 1803
Egypt—Papers, 1240
England, North of—New University—Issue of a Charter, 698
India—Afghanistan—The War—Basis of Peace, 698, 1266
India—East India Revenue Accounts—Financial Statement, 130, 237, 239; Comm. 1197
Indian Marine, 2R. 793
Irish Church Temporalities Commissioners—Mr. Ball, 396
Law of Distress, Res. 85, 401
London School Board Expenditure, Res. 1648
Metropolis (Little Coram Street, Bloomsbury, Wells Street, Poplar, and Great Peter Street, Westminster) Improvement Provisional Orders Confirmation, Comm. 1401
National Finances and Treaties—Control of Parliament, 134
Noxious Gases, 2R. 648
Parliament—Business of the House, 19, 20, 839, 840, 1141, 1434
Order of Business, 699
Public Business, Arrangement of, 403, 405, 407, 1240, 1551, 1722, 1813
Whitsuntide Recess, 134
Parliamentary Reporting, Select Committee on—The Report, 836, 1239
Persia—Retirement of the British Minister, 685
Prerogative of the Crown, Res. 271, 304, 325
Probate, Legacy, and Succession Duties, Res. 919
Railways—The Board of Inland Revenue—Season Tickets, 1548
Sugar Industries, Select Committee, 236
Summary Jurisdiction, Comm. cl. 54, 221
Supply—Register General's Office, England, 137
Superannuation and Retired Allowances, &c. 1518
The Government and the Telegraph Companies—Purchase of the United Kingdom Electric Telegraph Company—Charge of Fraud, 697
Treaty of Berlin—Miscellaneous Questions
Article 23, 399
Articles, Execution of, 568
Greek Frontier, 15, 1008
Turkey—Turkish Guaranteed Loan, 1855, 1705
University Education (Ireland), 326; Leave, 500, 503; 2R. 987, 1002, 1021, 1028

CHAPLIN, Mr. H., Lincolnshire, Mid.

Africa, South—Civil and Military Commands, Explanation, 1254
Agricultural Depression in Ireland, 1396
Prerogative of the Crown, Res. 264

CHARLEY, Mr. W. T., Salford

Hypothec Abolition (Scotland), Consid. 1405
Summary Jurisdiction, Comm. cl. 16, 99

CHILDERS, Right Hon. H. C. E., Pontefract

Admiralty and War Office Regulation Act—
The Secretariat of the Admiralty, 398
Africa, South—Zulu War—Civil and Military Commands, 1227
Expense, 399, 1695, 1696
Parliament—Public Business, Arrangement of, 1723
Supply—Land Registry, 710

Children's Dangerous Performances Bill

[H.L.] (The Earl De La Warr)

1. Read 2^d, after short debate May 23, 1110
Committee May 29, 1407 (No. 64)

China—The Chefoo Convention

Question, Observations, The Earl of Carnarvon,
Lord Hammond, Lord Stanley of Alderley ;
Reply, The Marquess of Salisbury May 9, 1

Church of England—The Chapter of York Cathedral—Case of the Rev. James Fleming

Observations, Question, Lord Hampton ;
Reply, The Earl of Beaconsfield ; Observations,
The Archbishop of York June 16, 1887

Church of England—Glebe Lands

Moved for, "A Return from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners and from the Governors of Queen Anne's Bounty of all sales of lands belonging to or held in trust for parochial benefices or districts which have been effected or assented to by them respectively during the last ten years, specifying in each case the amount of land sold, the rental of the same, and the price obtained for it ; also the like particulars of all cases in which sales have been refused within the same period" (The Bishop of Peterborough) May 30, 1427 ;
Motion agreed to

Church of Scotland Bill

(Sir Alexander Gordon, Mr. Mackintosh)

- c. Bill withdrawn * June 16 [Bill 39]

City of London School Bill (Lords)

- c. Moved, "That the City of London School Bill be referred to a Select Committee, Three to be nominated by the House, and Two by the Committee of Selection

"That all Petitions against the Bill, presented on or before the 17th instant, be referred to the Committee, and that such Petitioners as pray to be heard by themselves, their Counsel, or Agents, be heard upon their Petitions, if they think fit, and Counsel heard in favour of the Bill against such Petitioners

"That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records:—That Three be the quorum" (Mr. Raikes) May 13, 231 ;
Motion agreed to

Coal Mines—The Dinas Colliery Explosion

Question, Mr. Macdonald ; Answer, Mr. Asshe-
ton Cross June 13, 1811

COCHRANE, Mr. A. D. W. R. Baillie-Isle of Wight

Africa, South—Zulu War, 1377
Hypothec Abolition (Scotland), Considered. 1401
Metropolis—Local Taxation, Motion for a
Select Committee, 1813, 1832

COGAN, Right Hon. W. H. F., Kildare

Law of Distress, Res. 63
University Education (Ireland), 1032

COLCHESTER, Lord

Turkey—Crete—Disturbances, 1408

COLE, Mr. H. T., Penryn, &c.

Law of Distress, Res. 71
Summary Jurisdiction, Comm. cl. 16, Amendt.
95, 96, 98 ; cl. 54, 221 ; cl. 55, Amendt. ib.
223 ; Considered. 1096, 1100 ; Schedule 1,
Amendt. 1108
Supply—Convict Establishments in England
and the Colonies, 745
Prisons in England and Wales, 1269, 1270

COLEBROOKE, Sir T. E., Leamington, N.

Supply—Law and Justice, Scotland, 1471
Register House, Edinburgh, 1471, 1478

COLTHURST, Colonel D. La Zouche, Cork Co.

Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 32,
456 ; cl. 40, 592 ; cl. 42, 854
Army Estimates—Military Law, Administration of, 1942
Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) (No. 2), 28.
340

Common Law Procedure and Judicature Acts Amendment Bill

(Mr. Waddy, Mr. Wheelhouse, Mr. Ridley)

- c. Ordered ; read 1^o * May 14 [Bill 181]
Read 2^d, after short debate May 23, 1201
Committee *—R.P. June 9
Committee [House counted out] June 12, 1804
Committee * ; Report June 16

Consolidated Fund (No. 3) Bill

(Mr. Raikes, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson)

- c. Ordered ; read 1^o * May 16
Read 2^o * May 19
Committee * ; Report May 20
Read 3^o * May 21
1. Read 1^o * (Earl of Beaconsfield) May 23
Read 2^o * ; Committee negatived ; read 3^o
May 26
Royal Assent May 27 [42 Vict. c. 14]

Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act,
1875—"Besetting"

Question, Mr. Burt ; Answer, Mr. Assheton
Cross May 22, 1907

Contagious Diseases Acts

Select Committee appointed, "to inquire into the Contagious Diseases Acts, 1866—1869, their administration, operation, and effect" June 11; List of the Committee, 1895

Contagious Diseases (Animals) Acts

Cattle from the United States, Question, Mr. Mundella; Answer, Lord George Hamilton May 12, 128

Foreign Sheep, Question, Dr. Cameron; Answer Lord George Hamilton May 9, 13

Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878

American Pigs, Question, The Earl of Belmore; Answer, The Duke of Richmond and Gordon May 29, 1406

Convention (Ireland) Act Repeal (No. 2) Bill
(The Lord O'Hagan)

l. Read 1st May 9 (No. 77)
Read 2nd May 30, 1428
Committee: Report June 16, 1898

Conveyancing and Land Transfer (Scotland) Act (1874) Amendment Bill

(Mr. Yeaman, Mr. Baxter, Dr. Cameron)

c. Ordered; read 1st May 26 [Bill 198]
Read 2nd June 10

CONYNGHAM, Lord F. N., Clare

Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) (No. 2), 2R. 347
Reproductive Loan Fund (Ireland)—Loans to Clare Fishermen, 1912

Coolies—Jamaica

Question, Mr. Macdonald; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach June 16, 1912

Copyright, Law of—Legislation

Question, Mr. Hanbury-Tracy; Answer, Lord John Manners June 12, 1706

CORRY, Mr. J. P., Belfast

Belfast Water, Consid. 566

Costs Taxation (House of Commons) Bill

(Mr. Raikes, Mr. Mowbray)

c. Ordered; read 1st May 19 [Bill 190]
Read 2nd May 22, 1109
Order for Committee read; Moved, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair" May 23, 1202; Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned" (Mr. James); after short debate, Question put; A. 21, N. 41; M. 20 (D. L. 110)
Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker, &c." put, and agreed to; Committee; Report
Read 3rd May 26
l. Read 1st (Lord President) May 27 (No. 99)
Read 2nd June 13
Committee*; Report June 18

COTTON, Mr. Alderman W. J. R., London
Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) (No. 2), 2R. 346

County Courts (No. 2) Bill [H.L.]

(Mr. Attorney General)

c. Read 1st May 19 [Bill 191]

COURTNEY, Mr. L. H., Liskeard

Africa, South—Miscellaneous Questions
Sir Bartle Frere, 1364

Transvaal, 1919

Zulu War, 1380

Costs Taxation (House of Commons), Comm. 1203

Customs and Inland Revenue, Comm. cl. 15, 1519, 1526; cl. 23, 1877

England, North of—New University—Issue of a Charter, 698

Law of Distress, Res. 81

Prerogative of the Crown, Res. 251

Summary Jurisdiction, Comm. cl. 16, 98

Supreme Court of Judicature Acts Amendment, Comm. 1541

Trustees Relief, 2R. 507

University Education (Ireland), Leave, 495, 503

COURTOWN, Earl of

Hares (Ireland), Comm. 1897

Courts of Justice Building Act (1865) Amendment Bill

(Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson, Mr. Gerard Noel)

c. Read 2nd, after short debate May 12, 2 [Bill 156]
Increase of Fees upon Suitors, Question, Mr. Herschell; Answer, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson May 19, 696

Courts of Justice Building Act (1865) Amendment [Expenses]

Considered in Committee May 16

COWEN, Mr. J., Newcastle-on-Tyne

Supply—Stationery, &c. 141

CRANBROOK, Viscount (Secretary of State for India)

Africa, South—Zulu War—Re-inforcements—Condition of the Regiments, 681

Army—Army Organization—Departmental Committee, 1905

Army—Condition of the Army and Short Service System, Address for Papers, 1426

India—Afghanistan—Peace Negotiations, 655, 1204

Bombay, Disturbances in, 795

India—Telegraphic Communication with India, Address for Papers, 822

Criminal Code (Indictable Offences) Bill

(Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Secretary Cross, Mr. Solicitor General, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland)

- c. Committee * ; Report May 12 [Bill 170]
Repeal of Statutes, Question, Mr. Anderson ; Answer, The Attorney General May 28, 1238
Report of the Commissioners, Question, Sir Henry James ; Answer, The Attorney General June 12, 1719
Memorandum of the Lord Chief Justice, Questions, Mr. Herschell, Mr. Wheelhouse ; Answers, The Attorney General, Mr. Assheton Cross June 16, 1915

CRIMINAL LAWMISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

- Alleged Cruelty at Hanley*, Question, Earl Percy ; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross May 9, 11
Capital Punishment Amendment Act, 1868—Execution of Catherine Churchill at Taunton—Admission of the Press, Question, Observations, Lord Houghton ; Reply, Earl Beauchamp ; short debate thereon May 29, 1412
Case of Edmund Galley, Questions, Sir Eardley Wilmot ; Answers, Mr. Assheton Cross May 9, 16 ; Question, Mr. Hopwood ; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross May 27, 1355
Case of — Ryan, Question, Mr. Sullivan ; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther June 13, 1312
Case of John Stanley, Question, Mr. P. A. Taylor ; Answer, Sir Matthew White Ridley May 13, 231
Circulation of Disgusting Literature, Question, Mr. O'Donnell ; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross June 12, 1718
Manslaughter of a Game-watcher—The Sentence, Question, Mr. P. A. Taylor ; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross May 15, 392

Criminal Law—The Convict "Theodoridi"
 Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Copies of any Memorial presented by or on behalf of the Convict 'Theodoridi' "

- "Of any Correspondence with respect to 'Theodoridi,' or Memorandum of any representations made on behalf of the Convict
 "And, of usual form, printed or lithographed, sent to the Judge who tried any convict on whose behalf any memorial may have been presented or representation made for his opinion" (Mr. Callan) June 16, 2030 ; after short debate, Motion withdrawn

CROSS, Right Hon. R. A. (Secretary of State for the Home Department), Lancashire, S.W.

- Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 44, 860, 861, 862, 863, 865
 Artizans' Dwellings Act, 1868—Private Burying Grounds, 1721
 Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875—"Besetting," 1008
 Criminal Code—Memorandum of the Lord Chief Justice, 1915

[cont.]

CROSS, Right Hon. R. A.—cont.

Criminal Law—Miscellaneous Questions

- Circulation of Disgusting Literature*, 1718
Edmund Galley, Case of, 16, 1356
Hanley, Alleged Cruelty at, 11
Manslaughter of a Game Watcher—The Sentence, 392

Criminal Law—Theodoridi, The Convict, Motion for an Address, 2031, 2032

Inclosure Provisional Order (Maltby Lands), 2R. 2029

Lunacy Laws, 1012

Metropolis—Open Spaces, 570

Metropolis—Local Taxation, Motion for a Select Committee, 1829

Mines—Miscellaneous Questions

- Dinas Colliery Explosion*, 1812
Mine Inspectors' Reports, 1137
Mines Regulation Act, 1872—Inspection of Coal Mines, 1808

Royal Commission on Accidents in—Exclusion of the Press and Constitution of the Commission, 1137, 1138

Parliament—Business of the House, 19

Prerogative of the Crown, Res. 320

"Princess Alice" Calamity—Proceedings at the Inquest, 1353

Prisons Act—Perth Prison, 17

Salmon Disease (England and Scotland), 1352

Summary Jurisdiction, Comm. cl. 5, 88 ; cl. 7, 89 ; cl. 8, ib. ; cl. 9, Amendt. 90 ; cl. 10, 92 ; cl. 11, 94 ; cl. 16, 96, 98 ; cl. 22, 99 ; cl. 23, 214 ; cl. 29, ib. ; cl. 39, Amendt. 215 ; cl. 56, 222 ; Schedule 1, 224 ; Consid. 1096, 1103, 1106, 1107, 1108

Supply—Broadmoor Criminal Lunatic Asylum, 1454, 1458

Convict Establishments in England and the Colonies, 744, 748, 752, 753, 755, 756

Courts of Law and Justice, Scotland, 1467, 1470

Lord Advocate, &c. Scotland, 1461

Prison Commissioners for Scotland, &c.

1486, 1487, 1488, 1439, 1490, 1491

Prisons in England and Wales, 1263, 1269,

1270, 1273, 1296, 1301, 1302, 1311, 1316, 1318, 1321

Register House, Edinburgh, 1479, 1484

Unreformed Municipal Corporations—Report of the Commission, 1720

Wellington College—The Commission, 1362

CROSS, Mr. J. K., Bolton

India—East India Revenue Accounts—Financial Statement, Comm. Motion for Adjournment, 1197, 1724, 1727, 1794

CUNINGHAME, Sir W. J. M., Ayr, &c.
Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 42, 845 ; cl. 44, Amendt. 1565

Customs and Inland Revenue Bill

(Mr. Raikes, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer—Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson)

- c. Question, Mr. Thomson Hankey ; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer May 9, 19
 Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2"
 May 19, 756

[cont.]

Customs and Inland Revenue Bill—cont.

Amend. to leave out from "That," and add "this House will not recognize or accept as binding any Treaty or other engagements entered into by Her Majesty's Ministers which might forestall or limit the control of this House over the financial resources and taxation of this Country, until full information as to such contemplated engagements has been laid upon the Table of this House, and this House shall have had the opportunity of expressing an opinion thereon" (Mr. Newdegate) v.; Question proposed, "That the words, &c.," after debate, Motion withdrawn

Main Question put, and agreed to; Bill read 2^o Committee—a.p. May 20, 887 [Bill 150]
Committee—a.p. June 9, 1518
Committee; Report June 13, 1875
Considered June 16, 2027

Customs Department

The Re-organization Scheme, Questions, Mr. Ritchie, Mr. Pease; Answers, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson May 15, 393; Question, Mr. Sullivan; Answer, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson June 12, 1703
The Tea and East India Departments—Defective Sanitary Arrangements, Questions, Mr. Fawcett; Answers, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson May 19, 695; June 10, 1549

Cyprus

Administration of the Government, Questions, Sir Julian Goldsmid; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer May 27, 1354; Question, Sir Julian Goldsmid; Answer, Mr. Bourke June 10, 1550

Administration of Justice—Ordinances of the Legislative Council, Questions, Sir Charles W. Dilke; Answers, Mr. Bourke May 15, 399; May 27, 1360; June 16, 1908;—Punishment of Priests, Question, Mr. Justin McCarthy; Answer, Mr. Bourke June 13, 1809

Revenue and Expenditure Accounts, Question, Mr. Dodson; Answer, Mr. Bourke June 12, 1705

The New Coinage, Question, Mr. Thomson Hankey; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer June 12, 1705

DALRYMPLE, Mr. C., Buteshire

Post Office—China Mails, 1007

Debtors Act (1869) Amendment Bill

Question, Mr. M. T. Bass; Answer, The Attorney General June 12, 1719

DE LA WARR, Earl

Children's Dangerous Performances, 2R. 1110; Comm. 1408

Workmen's Compensation, 2R. 120

DENISON, Mr. C. BECKETT-, Yorkshire, W.R., E. Div.

France, Commercial Treaty with, 18

India—East India Revenue Accounts—Financial Statement, Comm. 1800

[cont.]

DENISON, Mr. C. BECKETT—cont.

Metropolis—Local Taxation, Motion for a Select Committee, 1824

Parliament—Rules and Practice of the House, 1362

Railways—Railway Accidents—Adoption of Continuous Brakes, 1855

DENMAN, Lord

Disqualification by Medical Relief, Comm. 1340

Metropolitan Water Supply and Fire Brigade, Report of Select Committee, Motion for Papers, 1124

DERBY, Earl of

Tenant Right (Ireland), 2R. 809

DILKE, Sir C. W., Chelsea, &c.

Africa, South—Civil and Military Command^o, Explanation, 1264

Zulu War, 1383;—Royal Marines, 1019

Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. 649

Borneo, Northern—Cession of Land, &c. 1698

Cyprus, Island of—Ordinances of the Legislative Council, 399, 1360, 1908

Greece—Cyprus—Further Papers, 1360, 1433

Hours of Polling (Boroughs), 2R. 1665

Licensing Laws Amendment, 2R. 651

Metropolis (Little Coram Street, Bloomsbury, Wells Street, Poplar, and Great Peter Street, Westminster,) Improvement Provisional Orders Confirmation, Comm. 1400, 1401

Metropolis—Local Taxation, Motion for a Select Committee, 1829

Supply—Secret Services, 154

Woods, Forests, &c. Office, 150

Thames River (Prevention of Floods), Consid. 835

Treaty of Berlin—Greek Frontier, 16

Wormwood Scrubs Regulation, Nomination of Select Committee, Motion for Adjournment, 326

DILLWYN, Mr. L. L., Swansea

Courts of Justice Building Act (1865) Amendment, 2R. 225

Indian Marine, 2R. 793

Lunacy Laws, 1012

Parliament—Business of the House, 1141

Public Business, Arrangement of, 406

Prerogative of the Crown—Alteration of Motion, 132, 241; Res. 242, 275

Sugar Industries, Nomination of Select Committee, 929

Summary Jurisdiction, Comm. cl. 54, 219

Supply—Police Courts of London and Sheerness, 722

Dispensaries (Ireland) Bill (Mr. Bruen, Mr. Downing, Mr. Mulholland, Dr. Ward)

c. Committee; Report May 16, 650 [Bill 66]

Considered * May 19

Read 3^o * May 20

l. Read 1^o * (Viscount Hutchinson) May 23 (No. 88)

Disqualification by Medical Relief Bill*(Lord Aberdare)*

1. Committee May 27, 1338 (No. 6)
 Report * May 29
 Read 3* * May 30

Distress, Law of—see title Law of Distress

DODDS, Mr. J., Stockton

Probate, Legacy, and Succession Duties, Res. *
 887, 923

DODSON, Right Hon. J. G., Chester

Customs and Inland Revenue, Comm. cl. 25,
 1882, 1883

Cyprus—Revenue and Expenditure Accounts, 1705

Summary Jurisdiction, Consid. 1099; Schedule
 1, Amendt. 1106

Supply—Police, Counties and Boroughs (Great Britain), 729, 734

Prison Commissioners for Scotland, &c.
 1484, 1485, 1487

Prisons in England and Wales, 1267, 1318

Turkey—Turkish Guaranteed Loan, 1855, 1704, 1705

DORCHESTER, Lord

Army—Army Organization—Departmental
 Committee, 1907

Drainage and Improvement of Lands (Ireland) Provisional Order Confirmation Bill (The Lord Henniker)

1. Royal Assent May 23 [42 Vict. c. ii]

DUFF, Mr. M. E. G., Elgin, &c.

India—East India Revenue Accounts—Financial Statement, Comm. 1169

East India Loan (Consolidated Fund)

Bill (Mr. Raikes, Mr. Edward Stanhope, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer)

- c. Resolution in Committee * May 26
 Resolution reported; Bill ordered * May 27
 Read 1* * June 9 [Bill 201]
 [See title *India (Finance, &c.)—East India
 Loan [Consolidated Fund]*

East India Loan (£5,000,000) Bill

(Mr. Raikes, Mr. Edward Stanhope, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer)

- a. Bill ordered; read 1* * May 26 [Bill 197]
 Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2*" June 12, 1803
 Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned"
(Sir George Campbell); after short debate,
 Motion withdrawn
 Main Question put, and agreed to; Bill read 2°
 [See title *India (Finance, &c.)—East India
 [Loan]*

EducationEducation Department

*Birmingham Board Schools, Questions, Mr.
 Harcastle, Mr. Chamberlain; Answer,
 Lord George Hamilton May 12, 125*

*Teachers' Salaries, Question, Mr. Sampson
 Lloyd; Answer, Lord George Hamilton
 May 15, 401*

Elementary Education Acts

London School Board—Mr. George Potter.

Question, Mr. Onslow; Answer, Lord George Hamilton May 9, 14

[See title London School Board Expenditure]

*The Buckingham School Board, Question, Mr.
 E. Hubbard; Answer, Lord George Ham-ilt on May 22, 1017*

*North of England—The New University—
 Issue of a Charter, Question, Mr. Courtney;
 Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer
 May 19, 698*

EGERTON, Hon. A. F. (Secretary to the Board of Admiralty), Lancashire.
 S.E.

Army Estimates—Medical Establishments, &c.
 1972, 1973

Navy—Mr. John Clare, Case of, 1872

EGERTON, Hon. Wilbraham, Cheshire, Mid.

Noxious Gases, 2R. 647

Egypt

*Financial Changes—Dismissal of Mr. Rivers
 Wilson and M. De Blignières, Question, Mr.
 E. Jenkins; Answer, Mr. Bourke May 13, 236*

*Further Papers, Questions, The Marquess of Hartington, Mr. Chamberlain; Answers,
 The Chancellor of the Exchequer May 26, 1240*

*Mr. Vivian—The Papers, Questions, Mr.
 Otway, Mr. Whitwell; Answers, Mr. Bourke
 June 16, 1913*

*The French and English Governments, Question, Mr. Otway; Answer, Mr. Bourke
 May 27, 1361*

ELCHO, Lord, Haddingtonshire

Africa, South—Zulu War, 1369

Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 32, 449, 450; cl. 40, 581

*Army Estimates—Medical Establishments, &c.
 1949, 1951*

Militia, 1993, 1997

Volunteer Corps, 2007

*Metropolis—Local Taxation, Motion for a
 Select Committee, 1820*

Supply—Fishery Board in Scotland, 162, 163, 169

Turkey—Consul Blunt's Report, 1362

Elementary Education Provisional Orders
Confirmation (Brighton and Preston,
&c.) Bill [H.L.] (The Viscount Cranbrook)

- L.* Read 3^a * May 9 (No. 48)
c. Read 1^o * (Lord George Hamilton) May 13
 Read 2^o * May 20 [Bill 177]
 Committee * ; Report May 27
 Read 3^o * June 10

Elementary Education Provisional Orders
Confirmation (London) Bill [H.L.]
 (Lord George Hamilton)

- c.* Read 1^o * May 13 [Bill 176]
 Read 2^o * May 20
 Committee * ; Report May 27
 Read 3^o * June 10

ELLENBOROUGH, Lord

Army—Brigade Depot System, Res. 1216
 Army—Condition of the Army and Short Service System, Address for Papers, 1421

ELPHINSTONE, Sir J. D., Portsmouth
 Supply—Fishery Board in Scotland, 172

ENFIELD, Viscount

Racecourses (Metropolis), 2R. 100, 109, 117

Entail (Scotland) Bill

(Mr. James Barclay, Mr. Mackintosh)

- c.* Ordered ; read 1^o * May 21 [Bill 193]

ERRINGTON, Mr. G., Longford Co.

Africa, South—Zulu War—Surgeon Major Reynolds, 123
 France—Demonetization of Silver, 1720
 Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions
 Prisons Act, Sec. 27—Prisons Board—Medical Officers, 685, 1139
 Religious Disturbances at Omey Island, County Galway, 686, 687
 Medical Reform, 124
 Spain—Labour in Cuba, 124
 Supply—Court of Bankruptcy in Ireland, 1515
 Prison Commissioners for Scotland, &c. 1490
 University Education (Ireland), Leave, 504

EWING, Mr. A. ORR-, Dumbartonshire

Supply—Fishery Board in Scotland, 172
 Local Taxation in Scotland, 182

EXCHEQUER, CHANCELLOR of the (see CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER)

FAWCETT, Mr. H., Hackney

Africa, South—Civil and Military Commands, Explanation, 1254
 Custom House—Tea and East India Departments—Defective Sanitary Arrangements, 695, 1549
 Customs and Inland Revenue, Comm. cl. 15,
 Motion for reporting Progress, 1523, 1535
 East India (Loan), 2R. 1804
 East India Loan (Consolidated Fund), Report, 1400

FAWCETT, Mr. H.—cont.

India—East India Revenue Accounts—Financial Statement, 129, 130 ; Comm. Amendt. 1071, 1074, 1093, 1198, 1795
 London School Board Expenditure, Res. 1647
 Parliament—Public Business, Arrangement of, 1722
 Prerogative of the Crown, 240, 241 ; Res. 301
 University Education (Ireland), Leave, 497

Felixstowe Railway and Pier Bill [Lords]
 (by Order)

- c.* Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o"
 June 10, 1843
 Amendt. to leave out "now," and add "upon this day three months" (Colonel Jervis) ;
 Question proposed, "That 'now,' &c. ;"
 after short debate, Amendt. withdrawn
 Main Question put, and agreed to ; Bill read 2^o

Fiji—Execution of Native Prisoners—Alleged Barbarities

Question, Mr. A. Moore ; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach May 26, 1234

Fishery Laws—Violation by Steam Trawlers

Question, Sir David Wedderburn ; Answer, Mr. W. H. Smith June 13, 1807

FITZMAURICE, Lord E. G., Calne

Parliament—Order of Business, 699
 University Education (Ireland), 2R. 943

FLOYER, Mr. J., Dorsetshire

Supply—Broadmoor Criminal Lunatic Asylum, 1458

Foreign Policy of Her Majesty's Government—Results in Europe and Asia

Question, Observations, The Earl of Beaconsfield ; Reply, The Duke of Argyll May 15, 380 ; Observations, The Duke of Argyll ; Reply, The Earl of Beaconsfield ; debate thereon May 16, 508

FORSTER, Right Hon. W. E., Bradford

Africa, South—Miscellaneous Questions
 Civil and Military Commands, 1227 ; Explanation, 1248
 Negotiations with the Boers, 698
 Zulu War—Alleged Cruelties of the British Army, 1714
 Borneo, Northern—Cession of Land, &c. 1699, 1911
 France, Commercial Treaty with, 18
 "General Statistical Abstract"—Foreign Tariffs on British Produce, 1140
 Hours of Polling (Boroughs), 2R. 1687
 London School Board Expenditure, Res. 1624, 1648
 Parliament—Business of the House, 839
 Public Business, Arrangement of, 1240, 1813
 Thames River (Prevention of Floods), Consol. 831, 835
 Turkey—Anti-Slave Trade Treaty, 1238
 University Education (Ireland), Leave, 493

[cont.]

FORSYTH, Mr. W., Marylebone

Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 42, 844

FORTESCUE, Earl

Army—Condition of the Army and Short Service System, Address for Papers, 1422, 1423
Criminal Law—Catherine Churchill, Execution of, at Taunton—Admission of the Press, 1415
Disqualification by Medical Relief, Comm. 1340
Metropolitan Water Supply and Fire Brigade, Report of Select Committee, Motion for Papers, 1125

France

Commercial Treaty, The, Questions, Mr. W. E. Forster, Mr. C. Beckett-Denison; Answers, Mr. Bourke May 9, 18;—Prolongation of the Treaty, Question, Mr. W. Cartwright; Answer, Mr. Bourke May 26, 1238
Demonetisation of Silver, Question, Mr. Errington; Answer, Mr. Bourke June 12, 1720

FRASER, Sir W. A., Kidderminster

Africa, South—Zulu War—Alleged Cruelties of the British Troops, 1718
Army Estimates—Medical Establishments, &c. 1967
Supply—Police Courts of London and Sheerness, 721
University Education (Ireland), 1024

FRENCH, Hon. C., Roscommon

Africa, South—Zulu War—80th Rifles—Court Martial, 123, 234, 402

Friendly Societies Act (1875) Amendment Bill (The Earl of Beaconsfield)

l. Royal Assent May 23 [42 Vict. c. 9]

GALLOWAY, Earl of

Army—Army Organization—Departmental Committee, 1902
Army—Brigade Depot Centres, Address for a Return, 119
Army—Brigade Depot System, Res. 1205, 1225
Army—Condition of the Army and Short Service System, Address for Papers, 1420, 1425

Gas and Water Provisional Orders Confirmation Bill

(Mr. John G. Talbot, Viscount Sandon)

c. Committee* (on re-comm.); Report May 26 [Bill 136]
Read 3^o May 27
l. Read 1^o (Lord Henniker) May 27 (No. 101)
Read 2^o June 16

General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Provisional Order (Inverness) Bill (The Lord Steward)

l. Royal Assent May 23 [42 Vict. c. iv]

General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Provisional Order (Paisley) Bill (The Lord Steward)

l. Royal Assent May 23 [42 Vict. c. iii]

"General Statistical Abstract"—Foreign Tariffs on British Produce

Questions, Mr. W. E. Forster, Mr. John Bright; Answers, Viscount Sandon May 23, 1140

GIBSON, Right Hon. E., (Attorney General for Ireland), Dublin University

Illegal Lotteries, 1810

Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions

Carrick-on-Suir Bridge, 1875

High Court of Justice—Business in the Chancery Division, 1703

Irish Church Mission—Distribution of Tracts, 1232

Netterville Trust Property—The Louth Institution, 1151

Registrars of County Courts, 1919

Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) (No. 2), 2R. 366, 373

Law of Distress, Res. 78, 80

Summary Jurisdiction, Comm. cl. 11, 94; cl. 16, 95, 98; cl. 29, 215

Supply—Court of Bankruptcy in Ireland, 1515
Criminal Prosecutions, &c. in Ireland, 1512

GIFFARD, Sir H. S. (see SOLICITOR GENERAL, The)GILES, Mr. A., *Southampton

Customs and Inland Revenue, Comm. cl. 23, 1880

GLADSTONE, Right Hon. W. E., Greenwich

Africa, South—Zulu War, 1374

India—Afghanistan (Expenses of Military Operations)—Incidence of Expenditure, Petition presented, 1226

India—East India Revenue Accounts—Petitions presented, 1723;—Financial Statement, Comm. 1059, 1197, 1739

Prerogative of the Crown, Res. 264, 265

GOLDNEY, Mr. G., Chippenham

Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 34, 463; cl. 36, 465; cl. 40, 581

Hours of Polling (Boroughs), 2R. 1694

Probate, Legacy, and Succession Duties, Res. 915

Supply—Secret Services, 154

GOLDSMID, Sir J., Rochester

Africa, South—Civil and Military Commands, Explanation, 1259

Zulu War, 1368, 1553

Customs and Inland Revenue, Comm. d. 23, 1878

Cyprus—Administration of the Government, 1354, 1355, 1550

"Home Rule" Party, 1040

Parliament—Public Business, Arrangement of, 404

Parliamentary Papers—Greece and Cyprus, 1433

GORDON, Sir A., Aberdeenshire, E.

Africa, South—Zulu War—Lord Chelmsford's Despatches, 1139

Army—Court of Inquiry at Netley in 1873, 837, 838

Organization—Departmental Committee, 1556

Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 30, 424, 432; cl. 31, 435; cl. 32, 436, 450, 453, 457; cl. 34, 462, 463; cl. 36, 468; cl. 39, Amendt. 574, 577; cl. 40, Amendt. 578, 582, 583, 584, 594, 597; cl. 42, Amendt. 604, 608, 609, 613, 843, 850; cl. 44, 879; Amendt. 885, 886, 1563, 1577, 1598

Army Estimates—Medical Establishments, &c. 1956, 1983

Military Law, Administration of, 1926, 1947

Parliament—Public Business, Arrangement of, 404

Supply—Fishery Board in Scotland, 164, 165, 169, 176

Local Taxation in Scotland, 183

Stationery, &c. 146

Treaty of Berlin—Eastern Roumelia, 10, 11

GOSCHEN, Right Hon. G. J., London

East India (Loan), Comm. 1200

India—East India Revenue Accounts—Financial Statement, Comm. 1198, 1770

GOURLEY, Mr. E. T., Sunderland

Army Medical Service—Invalided Medical Officers, 1897

Army Organization—Departmental Committee, 1551; Motion for Adjournment, 1553, 1562

Merchant Shipping Acts—Shipping Office Fees, 131

Navy—H.M.S. "Iron Duke," 131

Supply—Prisons in England and Wales, 1287

Grand Juries (Ireland) Bill (Mr. James

Lowther, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland)

c. Ordered; read 1^o * May 26 [Bill 199]

GRANVILLE, Earl

Foreign Policy of Her Majesty's Government, 564

Metropolitan Water Supply and Fire Brigade—Report of the Select Committee, Motion for Papers, 1113

Parliament—Whitsuntide Recess, 381

Racecourses (Metropolis), 2R. 111

Tenant Right (Ireland), 2R. 812

Treaty of Berlin—Article 22—Occupation of Bulgaria and Eastern Roumelia, Motion for Correspondence, 663

Great Seal Bill [H.L.]

(Mr. Attorney General)

c. Read 1^o * May 14 [Bill 180]

Read 2^o, after short debate May 19, 788

Greece—Cyprus—Further Papers

Questions, Sir Charles W. Dilke, Mr. Monk; Answers, Mr. Bourke May 27, 1360

VOL. CXXLVI. [THIRD SERIES.]

GREGORY, Mr. G. B., Sussex, E.

Hypothec Abolition (Scotland), Consid. 1405

Law of Distress, Res. 69

Probate, Legacy, and Succession Duties, Res. Amendt. 914

Summary Jurisdiction, Comm. cl. 11, Amendt. 93; cl. 12, Amendt. 94; cl. 43, Amendt. 216

Supply—Land Registry, 709

GREY DE WILTON, Viscount

Habitual Drunkards, Comm. cl. 3, Amendt. 390

GROSVENOR, Lord R., Flintshire

Railways—Railway Accidents—Adoption of Continuous Brakes, 1859

Habitual Drunkards Bill

(The Earl of Shaftesbury)

l. Committee May 15, 388 (No. 26)

Report * May 23 (No. 86)

Read 3^o * May 29 (No. 93)

HALSEY, Mr. T. F., Herts

Hours of Polling (Boroughs), 2R. 1668

HAMILTON, Lord G. F. (Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education), Middlesex

College of Science, Dublin—Professor Gallo-way, 392

Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1870—Cattle from the United States, 128

Foreign Sheep, 13

Education Department—Miscellaneous Questions

Birmingham Board Schools, 126, 127

London School Board—Mr. George Potter, 14

Teachers' Salaries, 401

Education (Scotland) Act, 1878—Examination of High Class Schools, 1013

Elementary Education Act—Buckingham School Board, 1017

India—East India Revenue Accounts—Financial Statement, Comm. 1190

Lloyds' Patriotic Fund, 570

London School Board Expenditure, Res. 1636, 1649

Medical Reform, 124, 400

HAMMOND, Lord

China—Chefoo Convention, 4

HAMPTON, Lord

Church of England—Chapter of York Cathedral—Case of the Rev. J. Flemming, 1887, 1897

HANBURY, Mr. R. W., Tamworth

India—Bombay, Disturbances in, 1008

Treaty of Berlin—Eastern Roumelia, 9

3 X

HANKEY, Mr. T., Peterborough

Customs and Inland Revenue, 19; Comm. cl. 15, 1521, 1528; cl. 24, 1882; cl. 25, 1883; add. cl. 1885, 1886
Cyprus—New Coinage, 1705
Metropolis—Local Taxation, Motion for a Select Committee, 1919
Supply—Land Registry, 714

HARCOURT, Sir W. G. V., Oxford City

Africa, South—Civil and Military Commands, Explanation, 1264
Zulu War, 1387
Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 30, 416, 417; cl. 32, 436, 438, 459, 460, 462; cl. 36, 466, 467, 473; cl. 38, 573; cl. 39, 577; cl. 40, ib., 580, 584, 588, 593; Amendt. 597; cl. 42, 844, 847, 848, 854, 855; cl. 44, 881
Army Estimates—Military Law, Administration of, 1948
East India (Duties on Cotton Goods)—Government of India Act, 1858, 233, 234
Great Seal, 2R. 789
Indian Marine, 2R. 793
Supply—Land Registry, 703, 711, 715, 716
Treaty of Berlin—Execution of Articles, 567
University Education (Ireland), Leave, 504

HARDCASTLE, Mr. E., Lancashire, S.E.

Education Department — Birmingham Board Schools, 125

HARDINGE, Viscount

Africa, South—Zulu War—Re-inforcements—Condition of the Regiments, 669
Army—Condition of the Army and Short Service System, Address for Papers, 1426

HARDY, Mr. A. GATHORNE-, Canterbury

Hours of Polling (Boroughs), 2R. 1680

Hares (Ireland) Bill

(Mr. Richard Power, Colonel King-Harman, Mr. Shaw, Mr. Herbert, Mr. French)

c. Read 2^o May 15, 506 [Bill 165]
Committee^o; Report May 16
Considered^o May 19
Read 3^o May 20
l. Read 1^o (Viscount Massereene) May 23
Read 2^o May 30, 1417 (No. 89)
Committee June 16, 1897

HARMAN, Colonel E. R., KING-, Sligo

University Education (Ireland), 2R. 973

HARRISON, Mr. J. F., Kilmarnock, &c.

"The Government and the Telegraph Companies"—Purchase of the United Kingdom Electric Telegraph Company—Charge of Fraud, 697
Valuation of Lands and Assessments (Scotland), Comm. 785

HARTINGTON, Right Hon. Marquess of, New Radnor

Africa, South, and Egypt—Papers, 1240
Africa South—Civil and Military Commands, Explanation, 1203

HARTINGTON, Right Hon. Marquess of—cont.

India (Finance, &c.)—Indian Budget, 237
Parliament—Business of the House, 19, 1433
Order of Business, 689
Prerogative of the Crown, Res. 312
University Education (Ireland), 2R. 1001, 1037

HAVELOCK, Sir H. M., Sunderland

Africa, South—Civil and Military Commands, Explanation, 1246
Army—Miscellaneous Questions
Commissariat and Transport Departments, 12
Discharged Soldiers, Civil Employment for, 1010
88th Regiment—Volunteers, 1011
Organization — Departmental Committee, 1554
Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 32, 441, 452; cl. 36, 465, 473; cl. 40, 583, 586; cl. 42, 845, 851; cl. 44, 886, 1550, 1594, 1599, 1604
Army Estimates—Military Law, Administration of, 1923, 1925
Militia, 1996
Lloyds' Patriotic Fund, 570
Prerogative of the Crown, Res. 324

HAY, Admiral Sir J. C. D., Stamford

Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 42, 605, 607

HAYTER, Colonel Sir A. D., Bath

Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 30, Amendt. 432, 433; cl. 32, 461; cl. 40, Amendt. 587, 589
Army Estimates—Militia, 1991
Volunteer Corps, 2014

HENRY, Mr. Mitchell, Galway Co.

Africa, South—Civil and Military Commands, Explanation, 1241, 1255
Agricultural Depression in Ireland, 1397
Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 44, 864, 877, 881, 884
Brewers' Licences, Motion for a Select Committee, 635, 642
Ireland — Religious Disturbances at Omey Island, County Galway, Motion for Adjournment, 689, 691
Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) (No. 2), 2R. 357
Supply—Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, &c. 212
Convict Establishments in England and the Colonies, 753
Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, &c. 194, 202, 206
Metropolitan Police, &c. 727, 728
Prisons in England and Wales, 1283, 1293, 1295, 1296, 1311, 1312
Stationery, &c. 139, 140
University Education (Ireland), Leave, 499; 2R. 971

HERSCHELL, Mr. F., Durham

Common Law Procedure and Judicature Acts Amendment, 2R. 1201
Courts of Justice Building Act (1865) Amendment Act—Increase of Fees upon Suitors, 696

[cont.][cont.]

HERSCHELL, Mr. F.—cont.

Criminal Code—Memorandum of the Lord Chief Justice, 1915
Customs and Inland Revenue, Comm. cl. 15, 1534
Summary Jurisdiction, Consid. Amendt. 1104

HERVEY, Lord F., Bury St. Edmunds
Admiralty—Director of Naval Construction, 1359
Thames River Traffic Committee—The Report, 1353

HIBBERT, Mr. J. T., Oldham

Hours of Polling (Boroughs), 2R. 1692
Supply—Broadmoor Criminal Lunatic Asylum, 1456
Convict Establishments in England and the Colonies, 745, 751, 756
Police Courts of London and Sheerness, 718
Prisons in England and Wales, 1314
Stationery, &c. 143

HICK, Mr. J., Bolton

Railways—Railway Accidents—Adoption of Continuous Brakes, 1857

HICKS, Mr. E., Cambridgeshire

Summary Jurisdiction, Comm. cl. 29, Amendt. 214; Schedule 1, Motion for reporting Progress, 224

HILL, Mr. A. Staveley, Staffordshire, W.

Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 32, 437; cl. 36, 463; cl. 41, 603; cl. 42, 611, 612, 614
India—Petition of Mr. W. Tayler—Sir F. Halliday, 1910
Law of Distress, Res. 84

HOGG, Lt.-Colonel Sir J. M'GAREL-, Truro

Metropolis—Public Roads, State of Repair of, 696
Metropolitan Bridges, 135
Supply—Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, &c. 210
Thames River (Prevention of Floods), Consid. 829

HOLKER, Sir J. (see ATTORNEY GENERAL, The)

HOLLAND, Sir H. T., Midhurst

Public Health Act (1875) Amendment, Comm. add. cl. Motion for reporting Progress, 1327
Supply—Convict Establishments in England and the Colonies, 754
Land Registry, 714, 716

HOLMS, Mr. J., Hackney

Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 30, Motion for reporting Progress, 407, 417, 431; cl. 44, 865

HOLMS, Mr. J.—cont.

Army Organization—Departmental Committee, 1559
Parliament—Business of the House, 840
Public Business, Arrangement of, 405
Post Office—Mail Contract with the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Company, 1720
Turkey—Anglo-Turkish Convention—Consular Appointments in Asia Minor, 1237

HOLMS, Mr. W., Paisley

Customs and Inland Revenue, Comm. cl. 15, 1530; Motion for Adjournment, 1537, 1539
Industrial Schools (Scotland), 133
Supply—Courts of Law and Justice, Scotland, 1464, 1471
Reformatory and Industrial Schools, &c. 1446

HOME, Captain D. Milne, Berwick

Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 40, Amendt. 596; cl. 44, Amendt. 1570, 1578
Salmon Disease (England and Scotland), 1352

HOPWOOD, Mr. C. H., Stockport

Army, Flogging in the, 836
Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 30, 425; cl. 32, Amendt. 456, 457; cl. 36, 465, 466, 473, 474; cl. 40, 583; Amendt. 584, 585, 586, 592; cl. 41, 603; cl. 42, 607, 612, 615, 843, 847, 855; cl. 44, 865; Amendt. 866, 883, 1583, 1594
Criminal Law—Edmund Galley, Case of, 1355
Parliamentary Elections—Haddington Burghs, 1232
Summary Jurisdiction, Comm. cl. 10, 91, 93; cl. 54, 216; Consid. 1106
Supply—Convict Establishments in England and the Colonies, 747
Police Courts of London and Sheerness, 723
Prisons in England and Wales, 1307, 1311

HOUGHTON, Lord

Criminal Law—Catherine Churchill, Execution of, at Taunton—Admission of the Press, 1412, 1415
Treaty of Berlin—Article 22—Occupation of Bulgaria and Eastern Roumelia, Motion for Correspondence, 663

Hours of Polling (Boroughs) Bill

(Mr. Chamberlain, Sir Charles W. Dilke, Dr. Cameron, Major Nolan, Mr. Mundella, Mr. Rathbone, Mr. Henry Samuelson) [Bill 11]

c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o" June 11, 1850

Amendt. to leave out "now," and add "upon this day three months" (Mr. Assheton); Question proposed, "That 'now,' &c.;" after long debate, Question put; A. 165, N. 190; M. 25 (D. L. 117)

Words added; main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to; 2R. put off for three months

3 X 2

[cont.

HUBBARD, Right Hon. J. G., London
Annual Financial Statement, 1697
Customs and Inland Revenue, 2R. 776; Comm.
add. cl. 1884, 1885
Elementary Education Acts — Buckingham
School Board, 1017
India—East India Revenue Accounts—Financial Statement, Comm. 1736
Valuation of Lands and Assessments (Scotland),
Comm. Motion for reporting Progress, 783,
785, 786; cl. 5, 787

HUNTLY, Marquess of
Racecourses (Metropolis), 2R. 116, 117

HUTCHINSON, Mr. J. D., Halifax
Prerogative of the Crown, Res. 289

Hypothec Abolition (Scotland) Bill
(Mr. Vans Agnew, Mr. Baillie Hamilton, Sir George Douglas, Colonel Alexander)
c. Consideration, as amended, deferred May 16,
850 [Bill 119]
Moved "That the Bill, as amended, be now taken into Consideration" May 27, 1401; after short debate, Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned" (Mr. Ernest Noel);
after further short debate, Debate adjourned

INOCHQUIN, Lord
Tenant Right (Ireland), 2R. 809

Inclosure Provisional Order (East Stain-more Common) Bill
(Sir Matthew Ridley, Mr. Secretary Cross)
c. Ordered; read 1st May 12 [Bill 174]
Read 2nd May 26
Committee*; Report June 9
Read 3rd June 10
l. Read 1st (The Lord Steward) June 13
(No. 108)

Inclosure Provisional Order (Maltby Lands) Bill
(Sir Matthew Ridley, Mr. Secretary Cross)
c. Ordered; read 1st May 12 [Bill 173]
2R. deferred, after short debate June 16, 2029

Inclosure Provisional Order (Matterdale Common) Bill
(Sir Matthew Ridley, Mr. Secretary Cross)
c. Ordered; read 1st May 12 [Bill 171]
Read 2nd May 26
Committee*; Report June 9
Read 3rd June 10
l. Read 1st (The Lord Steward) June 13
(No. 107)

Inclosure Provisional Order (Redmoor and Golberdon Commons) Bill
(Sir Matthew Ridley, Mr. Secretary Cross)
c. Ordered; read 1st May 12 [Bill 172]
Read 2nd May 26
Committee*; Report June 9
Read 3rd June 10
l. Read 1st (The Lord Steward) June 13
(No. 109)

Inclosure Provisional Order (Whittington Common) Bill
(Sir Matthew Ridley, Mr. Secretary Cross)
c. Ordered; read 1st June 13 [Bill 207]

INDIA

MISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

*Disturbances in Bombay, Observations, Que-tion, The Earl of Carnarvon; Reply, Viscount Cranbrook May 20, 794; Question,
Mr. Hanbury; Answer, Mr. E. Stanhope
May 22, 1008*

East India (Duties on Cotton Goods)—Government of India Act, 1858, Question, Sir William Harcourt; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer May 13, 233

*India Famine Commission, Question, General
Sir George Balfour; Answer, Mr. E. Stanhope May 12, 125*

*Kirwee Prizes Money, Question, General Shute;
Answer, Mr. E. Stanhope June 12, 1701*

*Return of Ecclesiastical Salaries, Question, Mr. Baxter; Answer, Mr. E. Stanhope
June 9, 1430*

Taylor, Petition of Mr. William—Sir Frederick Halliday, Questions, Mr. Staveley Hill, Sir Eardley Wilmot; Answers, Mr. E. Stanhope June 16, 1910

*The Four-and-a-half per cent Loan Allotment, Question, Sir Charles Mills; Answer, Mr.
E. Stanhope May 19, 694*

*Village "Panchayets" or Courts of Arbitration, Question, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman;
Answer, Mr. E. Stanhope May 20, 835*

India — Finance, &c. — The Vernacular Press—British Indian Association

Amendt. on Committee of Supply May 23, To leave out from "That," and add "this House regrets that Lord Lytton and his advisers have shown such unwise disrespect for the sentiments of a vast population, which is at the same time deprived of all constitutional representation, and subject to a harsh and grinding taxation of the most oppressive kind" (Mr. O'Donnell) v. 1142; Question proposed, "That the words, &c.:" after short debate, Question put; A. 215, N. 36;
M. 179 (D. L. 109)

India (Finance, &c.)—East India Revenue Accounts—Financial Statement

Questions, Observations, Mr. Fawcett; Replies, The Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr.
Speaker May 12, 129; Observations, Que-tion, The Marquess of Hartington; Reply,
The Chancellor of the Exchequer; Observations, Sir George Campbell May 13, 237

Ordered, That the several Accounts and Papers which have been presented to this House in this Session of Parliament, relating to the Revenues of India, be referred to the consideration of a Committee of the whole House
(Mr. Edward Stanhope) May 13; Committee thereupon upon Thursday 22nd May Order for Committee read; Moved, "That Mr.
Speaker do now leave the Chair" (*Mr. E.
Stanhope*) May 22, 1040

[cont.]

India (Finance, &c.)—East India Revenue Accounts—Financial Statement—cont.

Amendt. to leave out from "That," and add "this House, regarding with apprehension the present state of Indian Finance, approves the decision to reduce Expenditure" (Mr. Fanezett) v.; Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;" after debate, Amendt. withdrawn Question again proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair;" Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned" (Sir George Campbell); Motion agreed to Debate resumed May 23, 1160; after long debate, Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned" (Mr. J. K. Cross); after further short debate, Motion agreed to Debate resumed June 12, 1724; after long debate, Question put, and agreed to

Accounts considered in Committee, 1795

After further short debate, Resolved, That it appears by the Accounts laid before this House that the Ordinary Revenue of India for the year ending the 31st day of March 1878 was £51,795,866; the Revenue from Productive Public Works, including the Net Traffic Receipts from Guaranteed Companies, was £7,173,435, making the total Revenue of India for that year £58,969,301; that the Ordinary Expenditure in India and in England, including Charges for the Collection of the Revenue, for Ordinary Public Works, and for Interest on Debt exclusive of that for Productive Public Works, was £55,147,832; the Expenditure on Productive Public Works (Working Expenses and Interest), including the payments to Guaranteed Companies for Interest and Surplus Profits, was £7,364,558, making a total Charge for that year of £62,512,388; that there was an excess of Expenditure over Income in that year amounting to £3,543,087; and that the Capital Expenditure on Productive Public Works in the same year was £4,791,052

Resolution reported June 16

Petitions presented, Mr. John Bright, Mr. Gladstone June 12, 1723

India (Finance, &c.)—East India [Loan]

Considered in Committee

Moved, "That it is expedient to authorise the Secretary of State in Council of India to raise in the United Kingdom any sum or sums of money, not exceeding £10,000,000, for the service of the Government of India on the security of the Revenues of India" (Mr. E. Stanhope) May 23, 11

Amendt. to leave out "£10,000,000," and insert "£5,000,000" (Mr. Edward Stanhope) v.; Question proposed, "That '£10,000,000' stand part of the proposed Resolution;" after short debate, Question put, and negatived

Question, "That '£5,000,000' be inserted, instead thereof," put, and agreed to

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to Resolution reported May 26, 1325; after short debate, Resolution agreed to

[See title East India Loan (£5,000,000 Bill)]

India (Finance, &c.)—East India Loan [Consolidated Fund]

Considered in Committee May 26

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury to issue, out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the sum of two million pounds sterling, during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, by way of Loan, to the Secretary of State in Council of India

Resolution reported May 27, 1300; after short debate, Resolution agreed to

[See title East India Loan (Consolidated Fund) Bill]

India—Telegraphic Communication with India

Moved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for Copies of any minutes or memoranda by the Secretary of State for India, or by Members of Council, in 1873, on the subject of telegraphic communications with the Government of India (The Duke of Argyll) May 20, 830; after short debate, Motion agreed to

Indian Marine Bill

(Mr. Edward Stanhope, Mr. John G. Talbot)

c. Ordered; read 1^o May 14 [Bill 189]

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o" May 19, 791

Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned" (Mr. Whitwell); after short debate, Question put, and agreed to; Debate adjourned

Debate resumed June 16, 2038; after short debate, Question put, and agreed to; Bill read 2^o

Intoxicating Liquors (Ireland) Bill

Question, Mr. O'Shaughnessy; Answer, Mr. Sullivan May 15, 396

The Adjourned Debate, Observations, Mr. Callan, Mr. Speaker May 23, 1201, IRELAND

MISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

Board of Works—Carrick-on-Suir Bridge, Question, Mr. A. Moore; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther May 22, 1014; Observations, Mr. O'Donnell; short debate thereon June 13, 1873

College of Science, Dublin—Professor Galloway, Question, Mr. Lyon Playfair; Answer, Lord George Hamilton May 15, 391

Constabulary—Case of Sub-Constable Joyce, Question, Major O'Beirne; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther May 12, 122

Criminal Law—The Dungarvan Magistrates, Questions, Mr. O'Donnell; Answers, Mr. J. Lowther May 22, 1004

Fisheries of Sligo and the Bonet River, The, Question, Major O'Beirne; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther June 16, 1909

Forcible Dispersion of a Meeting at Cookstown, Questions, Mr. Callan; Answers, Mr. J. Lowther June 16, 1916

High Court of Justice—Business in the Chancery Division, Question, Mr. Sullivan; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland June 12, 1768

[cc

IRELAND—cont.

Irish Church Mission—Distribution of Tracts. Questions, Mr. O'Donnell; Answers, Mr. J. Lowther, The Attorney General for Ireland May 26, 1230

*Irish Church Temporalities Commissioners—*Mr. Ball, Questions, Mr. Sullivan; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer May 15, 895

Irish Prisons Board—Infirmary Surgeons, Question, Mr. Errington; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther May 23, 1139

National School Teachers—Legislation, Question, Sir Joseph McKenna; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther May 27, 1356

Poor Law

Blessington Dispensary (Naas Union) Medical Officer, Question, Mr. Parnell; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther May 26, 1236

Monaghan Board of Guardians, Questions, Mr. Callan, Mr. Newdegate; Answers, Mr. J. Lowther May 27, 1358; Question, Mr. Callan; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther June 9, 1431

Post Office—Telegraph Clerks, Question, Mr. M. Brooks; Answer, Lord John Manners May 12, 121

Prisons—Religious Denominations, Question, Mr. Biggar; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther June 13, 1809

Public Health Act—Loans for Paving Works in Dublin, Question, Mr. M. Brooks; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther May 23, 1135

Registrars of County Courts, Question, Mr. Meldon; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland June 16, 1918

Religious Disturbances at Omev Island, County Galway, Questions, Observations, Mr. Errington, Mr. Macartney, Mr. O'Donnell; Replies, Mr. Speaker, Mr. J. Lowther May 19, 636

Reproductive Loan Fund—Loans to Clare Fishermen, Question, Lord Francis Conyngham; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther June 16, 1912

Ribbonism—Tyrone, Questions, Mr. Verner, Mr. Mitchell Henry, Mr. Callan; Answers, Mr. J. Lowther May 26, 1228; Question, Mr. Callan; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther May 27, 1356

Supply—Vote 35, Class 2—Vote for Chief Secretary's Office, Question, Major O'Beirne; Answer, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson June 16, 1912

The Netterville Trust Property—The Louth Institution, Observations, Mr. Kirk; Reply, The Attorney General for Ireland; short debate thereon May 23, 1146

Ireland—Agricultural Depression

Moved, "That this House, at its rising, do adjourn until Monday 9th June" May 27, 1382

Amendt. to leave out "9th," and insert "2nd" (Mr. O'Donnell) v.; Question proposed, "That '9th' stand part of the Question;" after short debate, Amendt. withdrawn
Original Question put, and agreed to

Ireland—Landed Estates Court

Moved, for, I. Return (in continuation of No. 238, 1876,) showing (1) in Provinces, and (2) in Counties, the Landed Estates held either in fee, fee farm, for lives renewable for ever, or for terms of years of which sixty shall have been unexpired, sold in one or more lots in the Landed Estates Court for each of the years ending respectively 31st December, 1876, 1877, and 1878, giving the following particulars in each of the foregoing periods [and other details]

II. Return, in Provinces and Counties, of Estates sold during the years 1876, 1877, and 1878 in one or more lots in the Landed Estates Court under Part III. of the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, in which charging orders have been made in favour of the Board of Works, giving in each case the same particulars as in Return No. I (The Duke of Argyll) May 19, 664; Motion agreed to

Ireland—Volunteer Corps (Ireland) [Pay and Allowances, &c.]

Considered in Committee; Resolution thereon May 16, 652

ISAAC, Mr. S., Nottingham

Sugar Industries, Nomination of Select Committee, 925

Supply—Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, &c. 196
Theodoridi, The Convict, Motion for an Address, 2031

Italy—The Italian Police

Question, Sir Eardley Wilmot; Answer, Mr. Bourke June 10, 1548

JAMES, Sir H., Taunton

Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 38, 473; cl. 40, 584, 598, 597; cl. 41, Amendt. ib., 598, 600, 601, 603; cl. 42, 846, 847; cl. 44, 1568, 1577

Criminal Code (Indictable Offences)—Report of the Commissioners, 1719

Noxious Gases, 2R. Motion for Adjournment, 646, 647

Summary Jurisdiction, Comm. cl. 7, Amendt. 89; cl. 9, Amendt. 90; cl. 11, 94; Amendt. ib.; cl. 16, 96; cl. 29, 215; cl. 43, Amendt. ib.; cl. 54, 218; cl. 55, 223; Consid. 1100, 1105, 1107

JAMES, Mr. W. H., Gateshead

Africa, South—Zulu War—Transport Service in Natal, 838, 839

Costs Taxation (House of Commons), Comm. Motion for Adjournment, 1202

Open Spaces (Metropolis), 569

Railways—The Board of Inland Revenue—Season Tickets, 1548

Supply—Reformatory, Industrial, &c. Schools, 1436

JENKINS, Mr. D. J., Penryn, &c.

Admiralty—Director of Naval Construction, 1359

JENKINS, Mr. E., Dundee

Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 30, 422; cl. 31, Amendt. 433, 434, 435; cl. 32, 437, 446, 447, 452, 458, 460, 461; Amendt. 462; cl. 34, 463; cl. 36, 466; Motion for reporting Progress, 471; cl. 38, 573; cl. 39, 577; cl. 40, 579, 581; Motion for reporting Progress, 585, 586

Egypt—Dismissal of Mr. Rivers Wilson and M. de Blignières, 236

Medical Act (1858) Amendment (No. 3), 2R. 506

Parliament—Public Business, Arrangement of, 404

Prerogative of the Crown—Notice of Motion, 121, 240; Res. 296

Supply—Local Taxation in Scotland, 188
Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, &c. Amendt. 193, 198

JERRIS, Colonel H. J. W., Harwich

Felixstowe Railway and Pier, 2R. Amendt. 1543, 1547

JOHNSTONE, Sir H., Scarborough

University Education (Ireland), 2R. 1001

KAVANAGH, Mr. A. M., Carlow Co.

University Education (Ireland), Leave, 492; 2R. 956

KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH, Sir U. J., Hastings

Army Estimates—Volunteer Corps, 2013

KIMBERLEY, Earl of

Africa, South—Natal and the Transvaal—Appointment of Sir Garnet Wolseley as High Commissioner, 1205, 1331

Children's Dangerous Performances, Comm. 1407

Foreign Policy of Her Majesty's Government, 551, 553

Hares (Ireland), 2R. 1417; Comm. 1897

West Donegal Railway, Comm. 1335

KINGSCOTE, Colonel R. N. F. Gloucestershire, W.

Salmon Fishery Law Amendment (No. 2), 2R. 2030

KIRK, Mr. G. H., Louth

Netterville Trust Property—The Louth Institution, 1146

KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN, Right Hon. E. H., Sandwich

Africa, South—Zulu War, 1366, 1380

Brewers' Licences, Motion for a Select Committee, 616, 626

Navy—Pensions of Sergeants of Royal Marines, 1706

Parliament—Public Business, Arrangement of, 404

KNIGHTLEY, Sir R., Northamptonshire, S.

Summary Jurisdiction, Comm. cl. 54, 221

KNOWLES, Mr. T., Wigan

Railways—Railway Accidents—Adoption of Continuous Brakes, 1849

LAING, Mr. S., Orkney, &c.

India—East India Revenue Accounts—Financial Statement, Comm. 1085, 1799

Treaty of Berlin—Greek Frontier, 1005

Land Drainage Provisional Order (Bishopham, &c.) Bill (Lord President)

1. Committee*; Report May 9 (No. 65)

Read 3^d May 12

Royal Assent May 23 [42 Vict. c. xli]

Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) (No. 2) Bill

(Mr. Downing, Mr. Butt, Mr. Shaw)

c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o" May 14, 1899

Amendt. to leave out "now," and add "upon this day six months" (Sir Sydney Waterlow); Question proposed, "That 'now,' &c.;" after long debate, Question put; A. 91, N. 263; M. 172 (D. L. 93)

Words added; main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to; 2R. put off for six months [Bill 51]

LANDSDOWNE, Marquess of

Africa, South—Zulu War—Re-inforcements—Condition of the Regiments, 679

Law of Distress

Amendt. on Committee of Supply May 9, To leave out from "That," and add "it is desirable that the power of distraint for the rent of agricultural holdings in England, Wales, and Ireland should be abolished" (Mr. Blennerhassett) v., 20; Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;" after long debate, Question put; A. 202, N. 92; M. 110 (D. L. 84)

Legislation, Question, Colonel Barne; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer May 15, 400

LAWRENCE, Lord

India—Telegraphic Communication with India, Address for Papers, 824

LAWRENCE, Sir J. J. T., Surrey, Mid.

Metropolitan Bridges, 135

LAWSON, Sir W., Carlisle

Africa, South—Zulu War—Miscellaneous Questions

Detention of Messengers, 1432

Overtures of Peace, 1810

Returns of Killed, &c. 1352

Brewers' Licences, Motion for a Select Committee, 641

Customs and Inland Revenue 2R. 767

Hares (Ireland), 2R. 506

Spirits, Leave, 1541

LEEMAN, Mr. G., York

Railways—Railway Accidents—Adoption of Continuous Brakes, 1850

LEFEVRE, Mr. G. J. Shaw, Reading
Customs and Inland Revenue, Comm. cl. 15,
1531, 1532

LEIGHTON, Sir B., Shropshire, S.
London School Board Expenditure, Res. 1618
Supply—Prisons in England and Wales, 1274

LEIGHTON, Mr. S., Shropshire, N.
Customs and Inland Revenue, Comm. cl. 23,
Amendt. 1876, 1881

LESLIE, Sir J., Monaghan
Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) (No. 2), 2R.
363

Licensing Laws Amendment Bill
(Mr. Staveley Hill, Mr. Mundella, Mr. Rodwell)

c. Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendt. proposed to Question [17th April],
"That the Bill be now read 2°;" and which Amendt. was, to leave out "now," and add
"upon this day six months" (Sir Harcourt Johnstone); Question again proposed; Debate resumed May 16, 651
Question put; A. 48, N. 30; M. 18 (D. L. 101)
Main Question put, and agreed to; Bill read 2°
[Bill 25]

LIFFORD, Viscount
Tenant Right (Ireland), 2R. Amendt. 798
West Donegal Railway, Comm. 1335

LIMERICK, Earl of
Army—Brigade Depot System, Res. 1224

LINDSAY, Colonel R. J. Loyd (Financial Secretary for War), *Berkshire
Africa, South—Zulu War—Miscellaneous Questions
Railways, 131
60th Rifles—Court Martial, 123
Surgeon Major Reynolds, 123
Army Estimates—Medical Establishments, &c.
1967
Volunteer Corps, 2016
Wormwood Scrubs Regulation, Nomination of
a Select Committee, 326

Linen and Hempen Manufactures (Ireland) Bill (Mr. James Lowther, Mr.
Attorney General for Ireland)

c. Acts read; considered in Committee; Resolution agreed to, and reported; Bill ordered;
read 1° June 9 [Bill 202]

LLOYD, Mr. M., Beaumaris
Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 40,
594; cl. 44, 859, 861
Summary Jurisdiction, Comm. cl. 54, 219;
cl. 55, 223; Consid. Amendt. 1093; Schedule 1, Amendt. 1107
Supply—Land Registry, 713

LLOYD, Mr. S. S., Plymouth
Customs and Inland Revenue, Comm. cl. 15,
1520, 1527
Education Department—Teachers' Salaries, 401
India—East India Revenue Accounts—Financial Statement, Comm. 1088

Lloyds' Patriotic Fund
Question, Sir Henry Havelock; Answer, Lord
George Hamilton May 16, 570

Local Government (Highways) Provisional Orders (Buckingham, &c.) Bill
(Mr. Salt, Mr. Selater-Booth)

c. Read 2° May 14 [Bill 161]
Committee*; Report May 22
Read 3° May 23
l. Read 1° (The Lord President) May 26
Read 2° June 16 (No. 95)

Local Government (Highways) Provisional Orders (Dorset, &c.) Bill
(Mr. Salt, Mr. Selater-Booth)

c. Ordered; read 1° May 16 [Bill 186]
Read 2° May 27
Committee*; Report June 10
Read 3° June 11
l. Read 1° (Lord President) June 13 (No. 111)

Local Government (Highways) Provisional Orders (Gloucester and Hereford) Bill (Mr. Salt, Mr. Selater-Booth)

c. Ordered; read 1° May 16 [Bill 185]
Read 2° May 27
Committee*; Report June 10
Read 3° June 11
l. Read 1° (Lord President) June 13 (No. 112)

Local Government (Ireland) Provisional
Orders (Clonmel, &c.) Bill [H.L.]
(Mr. James Lowther)

c. Read 1° May 9 [Bill 166]
Read 2° May 16
Committee*; Report May 26
Read 3° May 27

Local Government (Ireland) Provisional
Orders Confirmation (Cashel, &c.)
Bill [H.L.] (Mr. James Lowther)

c. Read 2° May 23 [Bill 141]
Committee*; Report June 9
Read 3° June 10

Local Government (Ireland) Provisional
Orders Confirmation (Downpatrick)
Bill [H.L.] (Mr. James Lowther)

c. Read 2° May 23 [Bill 140]
Committee*; Report June 9
Read 3° June 10

Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (Killarney, &c.) Bill

(Mr. James Lowther, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland)

- c. Ordered; read 1^o May 13 [Bill 178]
 Read 2^o May 20
 Committee*; Report May 27
 Read 3^o June 10
 l. Read 1^a (Lord President) June 13 (No. 110)

Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (Waterford, &c.) Bill

(Mr. James Lowther, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland)

- c. Committee*; Report May 21 [Bill 183]
 Read 3^o May 22
 l. Read 1^a (Lord President) May 23 (No. 91)
 Read 2^a May 30
 Committee*; Report June 13
 Read 3^a June 16

Local Government (Poor Law) Provisional Orders Bill

(Mr. Salt, Mr. Sclater-Booth)

- c. Read 2^o May 13 [Bill 155]
 Committee*; Report May 22
 Read 3^o May 23
 l. Read 1^a (Lord President) May 26 (No. 96)
 Read 2^a June 16

Local Government Provisional Orders (Abergavenny Union, &c.) Bill

(Mr. Salt, Mr. Sclater-Booth)

- c. Committee*; Report May 26 [Bill 187]
 Read 3^o May 27
 l. Read 1^a (Lord President) May 27 (No. 103)
 Read 2^a June 16

Local Government Provisional Orders (Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings) Bill

(Mr. Salt, Mr. Sclater-Booth)

- c. Read 2^o May 16 [Bill 159]
 Committee*; Report May 26
 Read 3^o May 27
 l. Read 1^a (Lord President) May 27 (No. 102)
 Read 2^a June 16

Local Government Provisional Orders (Ashton-under-Lyne, &c.) Bill

(The Lord President)

- l. Read 1^a May 9 (No. 79)
 Read 2^a May 16
 Committee*; Report May 19
 Read 3^a May 20
 Royal Assent May 23 [42 Vict. c. xliii]

Local Government Provisional Orders (Aspull, &c.) Bill

(Mr. Salt, Mr. Sclater-Booth)

- c. Read 2^o May 20 [Bill 151]
 Committee*; Report June 9
 Considered* June 10
 Read 3^o June 11
 l. Read 1^a (Lord President) June 13 (No. 113)

Local Government Provisional Orders (Axminster Union, &c.) Bill

(Mr. Salt, Mr. Sclater-Booth)

- c. Read 2^o May 14 [Bill 154]
 Committee*; Report May 22
 Read 3^o May 23
 l. Read 1^a (Lord President) May 26 (No. 94)
 Read 2^a June 16

Local Government Provisional Orders (Aysgarth Union, &c.) Bill

(Mr. Salt, Mr. Sclater-Booth)

- c. Committee*; Report May 26 [Bill 142]
 Read 3^o May 27
 l. Read 1^a (Lord President) May 27 (No. 104)
 Read 2^a June 16

Local Government Provisional Orders (Cartworth) Bill

(Mr. Salt, Mr. Sclater-Booth)

- c. Read 2^o May 19 [Bill 158]
 Order for Committee discharged; Bill referred to the Committee of Selection May 26
 Report of Select Comm.* June 13

Local Government Provisional Orders (Castleton by Rochdale, &c.) Bill

(Mr. Salt, Mr. Sclater-Booth)

- c. Read 2^o May 19 [Bill 160]
 Committee*; Report May 27
 Read 3^o June 10
 l. Read 1^a (Lord President) June 13 (No. 114)

London School Board Expenditure

Moved, "That the rapidly increasing expenditure of the London School Board requires the early attention of the Government, with the view of imposing on it some more effectual checks than appear at present to exist" (Mr. Reginald Yorke) June 10, 1874; after long debate, Debate adjourned

LONGFORD, Earl of

Army—Brigade Depôt System, Res. 1217
 Army—Condition of the Army and Short Service System, Address for Papers, 1425
 Tenant Right (Ireland), 2R. 802

Lord Clerk Register (Scotland) Bill

(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Cross)

- c. Ordered; read 1^o May 26 [Bill 196]

Lotteries, Illegal

Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland June 13, 1870

Lowe, Right Hon. R., London University

India—East India Revenue Accounts—Financial Statement, Comm. 1185
 Supply—Land Registry, 712
 University Education (Ireland), 2R. 992

LEFEVRE, Mr. G. J. Shaw, Reading
Customs and Inland Revenue, Comm. cl. 15,
1531, 1532

LEIGHTON, Sir B., Shropshire, S.
London School Board Expenditure, Res. 1618
Supply—Prisons in England and Wales, 1274

LEIGHTON, Mr. S., Shropshire, N.
Customs and Inland Revenue, Comm. cl. 23,
Amendt. 1876, 1881

LESLIE, Sir J., Monaghan
Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) (No. 2), 2R.
363

Licensing Laws Amendment Bill
(Mr. Staveley Hill, Mr. Mundella, Mr. Rodwell)

c. Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendt. proposed to Question [17th April],
"That the Bill be now read 2°;" and which Amendt. was, to leave out "now," and add
"upon this day six months" (Sir Harcourt Johnstone); Question again proposed; Debate resumed May 16, 651
Question put; A. 48, N. 30; M. 18 (D. L. 101)
Main Question put, and agreed to; Bill read 2°
[Bill 25]

LIFFORD, Viscount
Tenant Right (Ireland), 2R. Amendt. 798
West Donegal Railway, Comm. 1335

LIMERICK, Earl of
Army—Brigade Depôt System, Res. 1224

LINDSAY, Colonel R. J. Loyd (Financial Secretary for War), *Berkshire
Africa, South—Zulu War—Miscellaneous Questions
Railways, 131
60th Rifles—Court Martial, 123
Surgeon Major Reynolds, 123
Army Estimates—Medical Establishments, &c.
1967
Volunteer Corps, 2016
Wormwood Scrubs Regulation, Nomination of
a Select Committee, 326

Linen and Hempen Manufactures (Ireland) Bill (*Mr. James Lowther, Mr.
Attorney General for Ireland*)

c. Acts read; considered in Committee; Resolution agreed to, and reported; Bill ordered;
read 1° June 9 [Bill 202]

LLOYD, Mr. M., Beaumaris
Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 40,
594; cl. 44, 859, 861
Summary Jurisdiction, Comm. cl. 54, 219;
cl. 55, 223; Consid. Amendt. 1093; Schedule 1, Amendt. 1107
Supply—Land Registry, 713

LLOYD, Mr. S. S., Plymouth
Customs and Inland Revenue, Comm. cl. 15,
1520, 1527
Education Department—Teachers' Salaries, 401
India—East India Revenue Accounts—Financial Statement, Comm. 1088

Lloyds' Patriotic Fund
Question, Sir Henry Havelock; Answer, Lord
George Hamilton May 16, 570

Local Government (Highways) Provisional Orders (Buckingham, &c.) Bill
(Mr. Salt, Mr. Sclater-Booth)

c. Read 2° May 14 [Bill 161]
Committee*; Report May 22
Read 3° May 23
l. Read 1° (The Lord President) May 26
Read 2° June 16 (No. 95)

Local Government (Highways) Provisional Orders (Dorset, &c.) Bill
(Mr. Salt, Mr. Sclater-Booth)

c. Ordered; read 1° May 16 [Bill 186]
Read 2° May 27
Committee*; Report June 10
Read 3° June 11
l. Read 1° (Lord President) June 13 (No. 111)

Local Government (Highways) Provisional Orders (Gloucester and Hereford) Bill (Mr. Salt, Mr. Sclater-Booth)

c. Ordered; read 1° May 16 [Bill 185]
Read 2° May 27
Committee*; Report June 10
Read 3° June 11
l. Read 1° (Lord President) June 13 (No. 112)

Local Government (Ireland) Provisional
Orders (Clonmel, &c.) Bill [H.L.]
(Mr. James Lowther)

c. Read 1° May 9 [Bill 166]
Read 2° May 16
Committee*; Report May 26
Read 3° May 27

Local Government (Ireland) Provisional
Orders Confirmation (Cashel, &c.)
Bill [H.L.] (Mr. James Lowther)

c. Read 2° May 23 [Bill 141]
Committee*; Report June 9
Read 3° June 10

Local Government (Ireland) Provisional
Orders Confirmation (Downpatrick)
Bill [H.L.] (Mr. James Lowther)

c. Read 2° May 23 [Bill 140]
Committee*; Report June 9
Read 3° June 10

Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (Killarney, &c.) Bill

(Mr. James Lowther, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland)

- c. Ordered; read 1^o * May 13 [Bill 178]
Read 2^o * May 20
Committee*; Report May 27
Read 3^o * June 10
- l. Read 1^a * (Lord President) June 13 (No. 110)

Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (Waterford, &c.) Bill

(Mr. James Lowther, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland)

- c. Committee*; Report May 21 [Bill 133]
Read 3^o * May 22
- l. Read 1^a * (Lord President) May 23 (No. 91)
Read 2^a * May 30
Committee*; Report June 13
Read 3^a * June 16

Local Government (Poor Law) Provisional Orders Bill

(Mr. Salt, Mr. Sclater-Booth)

- c. Read 2^o * May 13 [Bill 155]
Committee*; Report May 22
Read 3^o * May 23
- l. Read 1^a * (Lord President) May 26 (No. 96)
Read 2^a * June 16

Local Government Provisional Orders (Abergavenny Union, &c.) Bill

(Mr. Salt, Mr. Sclater-Booth)

- c. Committee*; Report May 26 [Bill 137]
Read 3^o * May 27
- l. Read 1^a * (Lord President) May 27 (No. 103)
Read 2^a * June 16

Local Government Provisional Orders (Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings) Bill (Mr. Salt, Mr. Sclater-Booth)

- c. Read 2^o * May 16 [Bill 159]
Committee*; Report May 26
Read 3^o * May 27
- l. Read 1^a * (Lord President) May 27 (No. 102)
Read 2^a * June 16

Local Government Provisional Orders (Ashton-under-Lyne, &c.) Bill

(The Lord President)

- l. Read 1^a * May 9 (No. 79)
Read 2^a * May 16
Committee*; Report May 19
Read 3^a * May 20
Royal Assent May 23 [42 Vict. c. xliii]

Local Government Provisional Orders (Aspull, &c.) Bill

(Mr. Salt, Mr. Sclater-Booth)

- c. Read 2^o * May 20 [Bill 151]
Committee*; Report June 9
Considered * June 10
Read 3^o * June 11
- l. Read 1^a * (Lord President) June 13 (No. 113)

Local Government Provisional Orders (Axminster Union, &c.) Bill

(Mr. Salt, Mr. Sclater-Booth)

- c. Read 2^o * May 14 [Bill 154]
Committee*; Report May 22
Read 3^o * May 23
- l. Read 1^a * (Lord President) May 26 (No. 94)
Read 2^a * June 16

Local Government Provisional Orders (Aysgarth Union, &c.) Bill

(Mr. Salt, Mr. Sclater-Booth)

- c. Committee*; Report May 26 [Bill 142]
Read 3^o * May 27
- l. Read 1^a * (Lord President) May 27 (No. 104)
Read 2^a * June 16

Local Government Provisional Orders (Cartworth) Bill

(Mr. Salt, Mr. Sclater-Booth)

- c. Read 2^o * May 19 [Bill 158]
Order for Committee discharged; Bill referred to the Committee of Selection May 26
Report of Select Comm.* June 13

Local Government Provisional Orders (Castleton by Rochdale, &c.) Bill

(Mr. Salt, Mr. Sclater-Booth)

- c. Read 2^o * May 19 [Bill 160]
Committee*; Report May 27
Read 3^o * June 10
- l. Read 1^a * (Lord President) June 13 (No. 114)

London School Board Expenditure

Moved, "That the rapidly increasing expenditure of the London School Board requires the early attention of the Government, with the view of imposing on it some more effectual checks than appear at present to exist" (Mr. Reginald Yorke) June 10, 1874; after long debate, Debate adjourned

LONGFORD, Earl of

Army—Brigade Depot System, Res. 1217
Army—Condition of the Army and Short Service System, Address for Papers, 1425
Tenant Right (Ireland), 2R. 802

Lord Clerk Register (Scotland) Bill

(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Cross)

- c. Ordered; read 1^o * May 26 [Bill 196]

Lotteries, Illegal

Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland June 13, 1870

LOWE, Right Hon. R., London University

India—East India Revenue Accounts—Financial Statement, Comm. 1185
Supply—Land Registry, 712
University Education (Ireland), 2R. 992

LOWTHER, Right Hon. J. (Chief Secretary for Ireland), York City

Criminal Law—Case of Ryan, 1813
Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions
Agricultural Depression, 1398
Board of Works—Carrick-on-Suir Bridge, 1015, 1874
Constabulary—Sub-Constable Joyce, 132
Cookstown, Forcible Dispersal of a Meeting, 1917, 1918
Criminal Law—Dungarvan Magistrates, 1004, 1005
Fisheries of Sligo and Bonet River, 1909
Irish Church Mission—Distribution of Tracts, 1231
Irish Prisons Board—Infirmary Surgeons, 1140
National School Teachers, 1857
Netterville Trust Property—The Louth Institution, 1156
Poor Law—Blessington Dispensary (Naas Union) Medical Officer, 1237;—Monaghan Board of Guardians, 1359, 1432
Prisons Act, Sec. 27—Prisons Board—Medical Officers, 686
Prisons—Religious Denominations, 1809
Public Health Act—Loans for Paving Works in Dublin, 1136
Religious Disturbances at Omev Island, County Galway, 688, 689
Reproductive Loan Fund—Loans to Clare Fishermen, 1912
Ribandism, 1229, 1230, 1356
Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) (No. 2), 2R. 375
Parliament—Public Business, 1364
Supply—Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, &c. 210, 212, 213
Court of Bankruptcy in Ireland, 1513, 1515
Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, &c. 197, 198, 202

LUBBOCK, Sir J., Maidstone

London School Board Expenditure, Res. 1649
Netterville Trust Property—The Louth Institution, 1160

Lunacy Laws—Legislation

Question, Mr. Dillwyn; Answer, Mr. Assheton
Cross May 22, 1012

LUSH, Dr. J. A., Salisbury

Army Estimates—Medical Establishments, &c. 1951, 1975

LUSK, Sir A., Finsbury

Army Estimates—Medical Establishments, &c. 1959, 1975
Metropolis—Local Taxation, Motion for a Select Committee, 1822
Parliament—Public Business, Arrangement of, 406
Supply—Broadmoor Criminal Lunatic Asylum, 1460
Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, &c. 213
Convict Establishments in England and the Colonies, 755
Courts of Law and Justice, Scotland, 1469
Fishery Board in Scotland, 177

LUSK, Sir A.—cont.

Lord Advocate, &c. Scotland, 1463
Police, Counties and Boroughs (Great Britain), 741
Prisons in England and Wales, 1275, 1293
Queen's and Lord Treasurer's Remembrancer in Exchequer, Scotland, Amendt. 155
Register House, Edinburgh, 1483
Secret Services, 154
Stationery, &c. 148, 149

MCARTHUR, Mr. A., Leicester

Africa—West Coast—Sierra Leone—Custom Duties, 1699
Supply—Prison Commissioners for Scotland, &c. 1506

MACARTNEY, Mr. J. W. E., Tyrens

Religious Disturbances at Omev Island, County Galway, 686, 691

MACCARTHY, Mr. J., Longford

Cyprus, Island of—Punishment of Priests, 1899
Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) (No. 2), 2R. 353

MACCARTHY, Mr. J. G., Mallow

Ireland—Agricultural Depression, 1391
Carrick-on-Suir Bridge, 1874
Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) (No. 2), 2R. 348

MACDONALD, Mr. A., Stafford

Army Estimates—Medical Establishments, &c. 1976
Canada, Dominion of—Fortune Bay, Newfoundland, 12
Church of Scotland—Return of Communicants, 1702
Mines—Miscellaneous Questions
Dinas Colliery Explosion, 1811
Mine Inspectors' Reports, 1137
Royal Commission on Accidents in Mines—Exclusion of the Press and Constitution of the Commission, 1137, 1138
Prisons Act—Perth Prison, 16, 17
Railways—Railway Accidents—Adoption of Continuous Brakes, 1857
West Indies—Jamaica—Coolies, 1912

MACINTOSH, Mr. C. FRASER-, Internat. &c.

Education (Scotland) Act—Barvas (Island of Lewis) School Board, 1234
Supply—Courts of Law and Justice, Scotland, 1467, 1469
Lord Advocate, &c. Scotland, 1463
Register House, Edinburgh, Amendt. 1474, 1483
Uncertificated Legal Practitioners (Scotland), 232

MAC IVER, Mr. D., Birkenhead

Merchant Shipping Acts—"Kain v. Farmer," 1003
Parliament—Whitsuntide Recess, 134, 135
Trade, State of—Statement of the Prime Minister, 1019; Motion for Adjournment, 1020

McKENNA, Sir J. N., Youghal

Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 42, 615
 Hypothec Abolition (Scotland), Consid. 1405
 Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) (No. 2), 2R. 338
 National School Teachers (Ireland), 1356
 Supply—Court of Bankruptcy in Ireland, 1516
 Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Household, &c. 204
 Prisons in England and Wales, 1394
 University Education (Ireland), Leave, 503

McLAGAN, Mr. P., Linlithgowshire

Customs and Inland Revenue, Comm. cl. 18, 1634
 Supply—Local Taxation in Scotland, 187

McLAREN, Mr. D., Edinburgh

Post Office, Edinburgh, 401
 Supply—Police Courts of London and Sheerness, 721
 University Education (Ireland), 2R. 963, 964, 971

MAKINS, Lieut.-Colonel W. T., Essex, S.

Railways—Railway Accidents—Adoption of Continuous Brakes, 1839
 Summary Jurisdiction, Comm. cl. 10, 93

Malta—The Maltese Civil Service

Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach May 22, 1013

MANNERS, Right Hon. Lord J. J. R. (Postmaster General), Leicestershire, N.

Copyright, Law of, 1706
 Post Office—Miscellaneous Questions
 Australian Colonies—Conveyance of Mails, 397
 China Mails, 1007
 Eastern Mail Contract, 1702
 International Post Card, The New, 693
 Post Office, Edinburgh, 401
 Post Office (Ireland) Telegraph Clerks, 121
 Soldiers' Letters from South Africa, 1707, 1708
 Telegraphic Department—Female Clerks, 1230

MARTEN, Mr. A. G., Cambridge

Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 42, 608
 Law of Distress, Res. 71
 Prerogative of the Crown, Res. 287

MARTIN, Mr. P., Kilkenny Co.

Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) (No. 2), 2R. 373

MASSERESSE, Viscount

Hares (Ireland), 2R. 1417

Medical Act (1858) Amendment Bill

(Dr. Lush, Sir Trevel Lawrence, Sir Joseph M'Kenna)

c. Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendt. proposed to Question [12th March], "That the Bill be now read 2°;" and which Amendt. was, to leave out "now," and add "upon this day six months" (Mr. Sergeant Simon); Question again proposed; Debate resumed May 16, 648

Question put, and agreed to; Bill read 2°, and committed to the Select Committee on Medical Act (1858) Amendment (No. 3) Bill [Lords]

Medical Act (1858) Amendment (No. 2) Bill

(Mr. Arthur Mills, Mr. Childers, Mr. Goldney)

c. Read 2°, and referred to a Select Comm. May 16 [Bill 88]

Medical Act (1858) Amendment (No. 3) Bill [H.L.]

c. Moved, "That the Bill be read 2° to-morrow, at Two of the clock" May 15, 506; Question put; A. 39, N. 16; M. 23 (D. L. 96)

Read 2°, and committed to a Select Committee May 16

Select Committee nominated June 9; List of the Committee, 1542

Medical Appointments Qualification Bill

(Mr. Errington, Mr. Blennerhassett)

c. Read 2°, and committed to the Select Committee on Medical Act (1858) Amendment (No. 3) Bill [Lords] May 16 [Bill 62]

Medical Bills — The Select Committee—Witnesses

Question, Mr. Lyon Playfair; Answer, Lord George Hamilton May 15, 400

Medical Reform

Question, Mr. Errington; Answer, Lord George Hamilton May 12, 124

MELDON, Mr. C. H., Kildare

Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 36, 463

Army Estimates—Medical Establishments, &c. Amendt. 1860, 1866, 1869, 1870

Ireland—Carrick-on-Suir Bridge, 1873

Registrars of County Courts, 1918

Irish Church Temporalities Commissioners—Mr. Ball, 397

Parliament—Public Business, Arrangement of, 406

University Education (Ireland), Leave, 501

Merchant Shipping Acts

"Kain v. Farmer," Question, Mr. Mac Iver;

Answer, Viscount Sandon May 22, 1003

Shipping Office Fees, Question, Mr. Goulley;

Answer, Viscount Sandon May 12, 131

MEREWETHER, Mr. C. G., Northampton
Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 40,
585, 594; cl. 42, 850

METROPOLIS

MISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

Gravel in the Parks, Question, Observations,
The Duke of Rutland; Reply, The Duke of Richmond and Gordon May 12, 120

Open Spaces, Question, Mr. W. H. James;
Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross May 16, 589

State of Repair of Public Roads, Question, Sir
Eardley Wilmot; Answer, Sir James M'Garel
Hogg May 19, 696

The Metropolitan Toll Bridges, Question, Sir
James Lawrence; Answer, Sir James
M'Garel Hogg May 12, 135

Metropolis—Local Taxation

Amendt. on Committee of Supply June 13, To leave out from "That," and add "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the powers of the Vestries of the Metropolis, and their administration of the funds at their disposal" (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) v., 1813; Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;"
after debate, Question put, and agreed to Metropolis (Little Coram Street, Bloomsbury, Wells Street, Poplar, and Great Peter Street, Westminster,) Improvement Provisional Orders Confirmation Bill [H.L.]

c. Read 1^o * May 12 [Bill 175]
Read 2^o * May 19
Committee; Report May 27, 1400
Considered * June 10
Read 3^o * June 11

Metropolis (Whitechapel and Limehouse) Improvement Scheme Amendment Bill
(Sir Matthew Ridley, Mr. Secretary Cross)

c. Ordered; read 1^o * May 15 [Bill 184]
Read 2^o * May 26
Committee *; Report June 9
Read 3^o * June 10
l. Read 1^o * (Lord Steward) June 13 (No. 115)

Metropolitan Board of Works (Water
Expenses) Bill (*Sir James M'Garel
Hogg, Sir Charles W. Dilke, Mr. Rodwell*)

c. Ordered; read 1^o * June 10 [Bill 204]

Metropolitan Public Carriage Act Amendment Bill [H.L.] (The Lord Steward)

l. Presented; read 1^o * May 29 (No. 105)

Metropolitan Water Supply and Fire Brigade—Report of the Select Committee

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for Correspondence between the Society of Arts and the Secretary of State for the Home Department respecting the Water Supply of the Metropolis" (Earl Granville) May 23, 1113; after short debate,
Motion agreed to

MILLS, Sir C., Kent, W.

India—Four-and-a-half per cent Loan ment, 694

MILLS, Mr. A., Exeter

America, South—Chili and Peru—Hosti-695

Parliament—Public Business, Arrangem-
405

University Education (Ireland), 1035
Victoria—Constitutional Question, 1914

Mines

*Mine Accidents—The Royal Commission-clusion of the Press and Constitution
Commission*, Questions, Mr. Macdo
Answers, Mr. Assheton Cross May 23,

Mine Inspectors' Reports, Question, Mr.
donald; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross M-1137

Mines Regulation Act, 1872 — Inspecti-Coal Mines, Question, Mr. Burt; At
Mr. Assheton Cross June 13, 1808

MONK, Mr. C. J., Gloucester City

Blind and Deaf-Mute Children (Educa-402

Great Seal (Salary), Comm. 1109

Greece—Cyprus—Papers, 1361

Parliament—Business of the House, 114

Railway Commission, 1914

Supply—Stationery, &c. 138

Superannuation and Retired Allow-
&c. 1517

Theodoridi, The Convict, Motion for an dress, 2032

Treaty of Berlin—Greek Frontier, 15

Turkey—Turkish Guaranteed Loan, 1855,

MONTAGU, Right Hon. Lord R., I meath

Prerogative of the Crown, Res. 263, 264,
Amendt. 272, 275, 281, 286

MONTGOMERY, Sir G. G., Peeblesshi

Supply—Local Taxation in Scotland, 188

Queen's and Lord Treasurer's Rebrancer in Exchequer, Scotland, 15

Valuation of Lands and Assessments (land), Comm. 785; cl. 9, Amendt. 787

MOORE, Mr. A. J., Clonmel

Board of Works (Ireland)—Carrick-on Bridge, 1014, 1015

Fiji—Execution of Native Prisoners—Al
Barbarities, 1234

Supply—Prisons in England and Wales,
1285

Reformatory, Industrial, &c. Schools,
1442, 1443, 1445

MORGAN, Mr. G. Osborne, Denbighsh

University Education (Ireland), 2R. 974

MORLEY, Earl of

Racecourses (Metropolis), 2R. 115

Treaty of Berlin—Greek Frontier, 654

MUNDELLA, Mr. A. J., Sheffield

Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1870—
Cattle from the United States, 128
Customs and Inland Revenue, Comm. cl. 15,
Motion for reporting Progress, 1839
Inclosure Provisional Order (Maltby Lands),
2R. 2029
London School Board Expenditure, Res. Motion for Adjournment, 1847
Supply—Convict Establishments in England
and the Colonies, 754, 756

Municipal Corporations, Unreformed—Report of the Commission

Question, Mr. Whitwell; Answer, Mr. Asshe-
ton Cross June 12, 1720

MUNTZ, Mr. P. H., Birmingham

Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 32,
451, 457; cl. 40, 585; cl. 44, 1575
Supply—Police, Counties and Boroughs (Great Britain), 742
Prison Commissioners for Scotland, &c.
1489

MURE, Colonel W., Renfrew

Africa, South—Civil and Military Commands,
Explanation, 1253
Army—Miscellaneous Questions
First Class Army Reserve, 1012
Soldiers in Uniform, 1868
Volunteering from the Militia to the Line, 239
Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 30, Amendt. 407, 423; cl. 32, 436, 446, 477;
cl. 38, 572; cl. 40, 592; cl. 42, 612, 855;
cl. 44, 864
Army Estimates—Military Law, Administration of, 1926
Samoan Islands, 400

NAGHTEN, Colonel A. R., Winchester

Army Estimates—Militia, 1991

NAPIER OF MAGDALA, Lord

Spain—Contraband Trade at Gibraltar—Case of the "Rosalya," 1900

National Fund for Relief of Families of Soldiers, Sailors, &c.

Question, General Shute; Answer, Colonel
Stanley June 13, 1806

NAVYMISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

*Admiralty and War Office Regulation Act—
The Secretariat of the Admiralty*, Question,
Mr. Childers; Answer, Mr. W. H. Smith
May 15, 1993

Admiralty, The

The Director of Naval Construction, Question,
Mr. D. Jenkins; Answer, Mr. W. H. Smith
May 27, 1359

The Naval Department, Question, Observations, The Earl of Camperdown; Reply, The Duke of Richmond and Gordon May 27, 1350

[cont.]

NAVY—cont.

Case of Mr. John Clare, Observations, Mr.
Biggar; Reply, Mr. A. F. Egerton; Observations, Mr. Parnell June 13, 1872

Coaling at St. Vincent, Question, Colonel Beresford; Answer, Mr. W. H. Smith
June 16, 1914

H.M.S. "Iron Duke," Question, Mr. Gourley;
Answer, Mr. W. H. Smith May 12, 131

Mr. W. Froude, the late, Question, Mr. E. J.
Reed; Answer, Mr. W. H. Smith June 13, 1806

Pensions of Sergeants of Royal Marines, Question, Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen; Answer,
Mr. W. H. Smith June 12, 1706

NEWDEGATE, Mr. C. N., Warwickshire, N.

Africa, South—Civil and Military Commands,
Explanation, 1253

Zulu War—Alleged Cruelty of the British Soldiers, 1714

Customs and Inland Revenue, 2R. Amendt.
757, 782; Comm. cl. 15, 1524

Ireland—Poor Law—Monaghan Board of Guardians, 1358

Religious Disturbances at Omey Island,
County Galway, 690

National Finances and Treaties—Control of Parliament, 133

Parliament—Business of the House, 1141

Public Business, Arrangement of, 404

Prerogative of the Crown, Res. 294

Supply—Court of Bankruptcy in Ireland, 1514
University Education (Ireland), 2R. 995, 1023, 1032

NOEL, Right Hon. G. J. (First Commissioner of Works), *Rutland

Hypothec Abolition (Scotland), Consid. Motion
for Adjournment, 1405

Supply—Works and Public Buildings, 150, 151
Westminster Improvement Commissioners, 1014

NOLAN, Major J. P., Galway Co.

Army—Regimental Commands—The Five Years' Rule, 1010

Army Discipline and Regulation, 17; Comm.
cl. 30, 419, 432, 433; cl. 32, 453, 457, 460;
cl. 34, 463; cl. 36, 464, 467; cl. 40, 581,
584, 588; Amendt. 590, 591, 592, 596;
cl. 41, 599; Amendt. 600; cl. 42, Amendt.
610, 612, 613, 840, 846, 850, 855; cl. 43,
Amendt. ib., 856; cl. 44, 1564, 1595, 1597, 1601

Army Estimates—Medical Establishments, &c.
1965

Military Law, Administration of, 1937,
1941, 1944, 1948

Blind and Deaf-Mute Children (Education),
Consid. 226

Ireland—Carrick-on-Suir Bridge, 1874

Religious Disturbances at Omey Island,
County Galway, 686, 691

Parliament—Public Business, Arrangement of,
406, 1364

Prerogative of the Crown, Res. Motion for Adjournment, 321

[cont.]

NOLAN, Major J. P.—cont.

Supply—Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, &c. 209
Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Household, &c. 199
Prisons in England and Wales, 1290, 1295
Reformatory and Industrial Schools, &c. 1446
Report, 327
Stationery, &c. Amendt. 138, 141, 144
University Education (Ireland), Leave, 503; 2R. 1002, 1034

NORTH, Colonel J. S., Oxfordshire

Army—The Warrant of August 13th, 1877—Supersession of General Officers, 1136
Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 32, 439, 456
Army Estimates—Medical Establishments, &c. 1973, 1976

NORTHCOTE, Right Hon. Sir S. H.
(see Chancellor of the Exchequer)

Northern Borneo—Cession of Territory, &c.

Questions, Sir Charles W. Dilke, Mr. W. E. Forster; Answers, Mr. Bourke June 12, 1698; Questions, Mr. W. E. Forster; Answers, Mr. Bourke June 16, 1911

NORWOOD, Mr. C. M., Kingston-upon-Hull

Army Estimates—Medical Establishments, &c. 1980

Noxious Gases Bill

(Mr. Selater-Booth, Viscount Sandon, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson, Mr. Salt) [Bill 123]

c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o" May 16, 644

Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned" (Sir Henry James); after short debate, Question put, and agreed to: Debate adjourned

O'BEIRNE, Major F., Leitrim

Army—Balances of Deceased Soldiers, 1006
Organization—Departmental Committee, 1556

Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 30, 420; cl. 32, Amendt. 436, 438, 441, 456; cl. 40, 589; cl. 41, 602; cl. 42, 611, 851; cl. 44, 875, 1550, 1571, 1575

Army Estimates—Military Law, Administration of, Amendt. 1922, 1939, 1945, 1947
Volunteer Corps, 2007

Yeomanry Cavalry, Amendt. 2000

Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions
Constabulary—Sub-Constable Joyce, 122
Fisheries of Sligo and the Bonet River, 1909

Vote for Chief Secretary's Office, 1912

Supply—Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Household, &c. 201; Amendt. 204, 207
Prisons in England and Wales, 1293

O'BRIEN, Sir P., King's Co.

Africa, South—Civil and Military Co Explanation, 1257
Army Estimates—Military Law, Addition of, 1934
Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) (No. 2) Supply—Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, hold, &c. 200
Stationery, &c. 143, 144, 146

O'CONNOR DON, The, Roscommon

Parliament—Business of the House, & Order of Business, 699
Prerogative of the Crown, Res. 286
University Education (Ireland), 32
Leave, 475, 502; 2R. 930, 964, 101029

O'DONNELL, Mr. F. H., Dungarva

Africa, South—Miscellaneous Questions
Civil and Military Commands, Exp 1244

Natal—Indenture of Natives, 1016

Transvaal, 1265, 1266, 1363

Zulu War—Alleged Cruelties of the Troops, 1015, 1708; Motion & journalment, 1709, 1718

Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm 574; cl. 44, 1599

Army Estimates—Divine Service, 1921
Medical Establishments, &c. 1965,

British Indian Association, Res. 1142,
Criminal Law—Circulation of Dis Literature, 1718

India—Afghanistan—The War—Execu Prisoners of War, 18, 19

Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions

Agricultural Depression, 1389

Carrick-on-Suir Bridge, 1873

Cookstown—Forceful Dispersion of ing, 1918

Criminal Law—The Dungarvan trates, 1004, 1005

Irish Church Mission—Distribu Tracts, 1230, 1232

Religious Disturbances at Omev County Galway, 688, 692

Law of Distress, Res. 73

Scotland—Religious Disturbances at 1 693

Supply—Court of Bankruptcy in Ireland

Fishery Board in Scotland, Amendt.

Law and Justice, Scotland, 1470

Lord Advocate, &c. Scotland, 1480

Prison Commissioners for Scotland

1490, 1499, 1504

Prisons in England and Wales, 1286

Reformatory and Industrial Schoo 1447

University Education (Ireland), Leav 1036

O'GORMAN, Major P., Waterford

Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm 474

O'HAGAN, Lord

Convention (Ireland) Act Repeal, 2R.

Comm. 1898

Tenant Right (Ireland), 2R. 810

Omnibus Regulation Bill [M.L.]

(The Earl of Redesdale)

1. Committee *; Report May 20 (No. 41)
Committee put off May 29, 1406

ONslow, Mr. D. R., Guildford

Army Estimates—Medical Establishments, &c. 1951
East India (Loan), Comm. 1200; 2R. 1803
Education Department—London School Board
—Mr. George Potter, 14
India—East India Revenue Accounts—Financial Statement, Comm. 1092, 1167, 1798
Indian Marine, 2R. 793, 2028

ORANMORE AND BROWNE, Lord

Convention Ireland Act Repeal, Comm. 1898
Hares (Ireland), Comm. 1897

O'SHAUGHNESSY, Mr. R., Limerick

Army Estimates—Medical Establishments, &c. 1964, 1977, 1984
Intoxicating Liquors (Ireland), 395
Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) (No. 2), 2R. 336, 341
Supply—Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, &c. 209, 210; Motion for reporting Progress, 212
Fishery Board in Scotland, 168
Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, &c. 198
Prisons in England and Wales, 1292

O'SULLIVAN, Mr. W. H., Limerick Co.

Prerogative of the Crown, Res. Motion for Adjournment, 325

OTWAY, Mr. A. J., Rochester

Africa, South—Zulu War—Re-inforcements, 1018
Royal Marines, 1018
Egypt—French and English Governments, 1361
Mr. Vivian—Papers, 1913

Oyster and Mussel Fisheries Order (Blackwater, Essex) Bill

(The Lord Henniker)

1. Royal Assent May 23 [42 Vict. c. i]

PAGET, Mr. R. H., Somersetshire, Mid

London School Board Expenditure, Res. 1649
Summary Jurisdiction, Comm. c. 16, 96;
cl. 28, Amendt. 214; Schedule 1, Amendt. 224; Consid. Amendt. 1104, 1108
Valuation of Lands and Assessments (Scotland), Comm. 786

PARKER, Mr. C. S., Perth

Supply—Reformatory, Industrial, &c. Schools, 1426
Register House, Edinburgh, 1490

Parliament

Loans

Standing Orders Nos. 93 and 94, Observations, Lord Waverley; Reply, The Lord Chancellor May 23, 1128
The Whitsuntide Recess, Question, Earl Granville; Answer, The Earl of Beaconsfield May 15, 331

Private Bills, Time for the Second Reading of Private Bills brought from the House of Commons extended to the 17th day of June next May 27

Private and Provisional Order Confirmation Bills, Ordered, That Standing Orders Nos. 92. and 93. be suspended; and that the time for depositing petitions be extended to the first day on which the House shall sit after the Whitsun recess May 27

Commons

Parliamentary Elections—Haddington Burghs, Question, Mr. Hopwood; Answer, The Lord Advocate May 26, 1232

Parliamentary Papers—Greece and Cyprus, Questions, Sir Charles W. Dilke, Sir Julian Goldsmid; Answers, Mr. Bourke June 9, 1433

Rules and Orders of the House—Rule 153—Questions—The "Home Rule Party," Question, Sir Julian Goldsmid May 22, 1040

Rules and Practices of the House—The Cross Benches and the Gallery, Observations, Mr. C. Beckett-Denison; Reply, Mr. Speaker May 27, 1362

Select Committee on Parliamentary Reporting—The Report, Questions, Mr. Chamberlain; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer May 20, 836; May 26, 1239

The Whitsuntide Recess, Question, Mr. Mac Iver; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer May 12, 134
House, at its rising, adjourned until Monday 9th June May 27, 1364

Business of the House

Questions, The Marquess of Hartington, General Sir George Balfour, Mr. Rylands; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Asheton Cross May 9, 19; Questions, The Marquess of Hartington, Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice, Dr. Cameron; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer, The O'Connor Don May 19, 699; Debate on the Indian Budget, Question, Mr. W. E. Forster; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer May 20, 839; Questions, Mr. Monk, Mr. Newdegate, Mr. Dillwyn; Answers, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbotson, The Chancellor of the Exchequer May 23, 1141; Question, Mr. W. E. Forster; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer May 26, 1240; Dogs Regulation (Ireland, Act (1946) Amendment Bill, Question, Major Nolan; Answer, Mr. J. Lawther May 27, 1364; Questions, The Marquess of Hartington, Mr. Callan; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbotson June 9, 1423; Question, Sir David Webster; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer June 14, 1551; Morning Sitting, Questions, Mr.

(cont.)

PARLIAMENT—COMMONS—cont.

Fawcett, Mr. Childers, Mr. Rylands; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer June 12, 1722; Questions, Mr. W. E. Forster, Mr. Callan; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer June 13, 1813

Parliament — Arrangement of Public Business

Moved, "That the Orders of the Day subsequent to the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill be postponed until after the Notice of Motion for leave to bring in a Bill for promoting University Education in Ireland" (Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer) May 15, 403; after short debate, Motion agreed to

Parliament—Committees—Ascension Day

Ordered, That Committees shall not sit Tomorrow, being Ascension Day, until Two of the clock, notwithstanding the sitting of the House (Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer) May 21, 930

Parliament—Prerogative of the Crown

Notice of Motion, Mr. Dillwyn May 12, 121; Alteration of Motion, 132; Observations, Question, Mr. Fawcett; Reply, Mr. Dillwyn May 13, 240

Moved, "That to prevent the growing abuse by Her Majesty's Ministers of the prerogative and influence of the Crown, and consequent augmentation of the power of the Government in enabling them, under cover of the supposed personal interposition of the Sovereign, to withdraw from the cognizance and control of this House matters relating to policy and expenditure properly within the scope of its powers and privileges, it is necessary that the mode and limits of the action of the prerogative should be more strictly observed" (Mr. Dillwyn) May 13, 242

Amendt. to leave out from "That," and add "by the Constitution and Laws of this Realm, it is the right and duty of the Sovereign, with the advice of the Council, and only by that advice, or by the advice of Parliament, to direct the foreign policy of the Country, to negotiate and enter into Treaties, and to declare war or conclude a peace" (Lord Robert Montagu) v.; Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;" after long debate, Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned" (Sir Robert Peel); Question put; A. 46, N. 347; M. 301 (D. L. 91)

Question again proposed, "That the words, &c.;" Moved, "That this House do now adjourn" (Major Nolan); after short debate, Question put; A. 43, N. 307; M. 264 (D. L. 92)

Question again proposed, "That the words, &c.;" Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned" (Mr. O'Sullivan); Motion agreed to; Debate adjourned

PARLIAMENT—HOUSE OF COMMONS

New Writ Issued

May 13—For Limerick City, v. Isaac Butt, esquire, deceased

PARLIAMENT—COMMONS—cont.

New Members Sworn

May 9—Robert Peter Lawrie, esquire

June 9—The O'Gorman Mahon, Clare
Daniel FitzGerald Gabbett,
Limerick City

Parliamentary Burghs (Scotland

(Mr. James Cowan, Mr. M'Laren, Trevelyan, Mr. John Holmes)

c. Committee*; Report May 16 [1

Considered* May 19

Read 3* May 20

l. Read 1* (Earl Camperdown) May 23

Read 2* May 27

Committee*; Report May 29

PARNELL, Mr. C. S., Meath

Africa, South—Miscellaneous Questions
Civil and Military Commands, Exj
1265

Instructions of Sir Garnet Wolseley
1721

Zulu War, 1385;—Alleged Cruelties
British Troops, 1716, 1717

Army—Army Organization—Depa
Committee, 1560, 1563

Army Discipline and Regulation, Com
Amendt. 463; cl. 36, 471; cl. 38,
571, 574; cl. 40, 591; cl. 41, Ame
599, 600, 603; cl. 42, 606, 609, 6
854; cl. 43, Amendt. 856; cl. 44, ib., 860, 861, 862, 863, 879, 884, 15
1582, 1591

Army Estimates—Divine Service, 191

Medical Establishments, &c. 195
1968, 1970, 1972, 1974, 1978;
1980, 1982, 1983, 1990

Military Law, Administration o
1948

Militia, Amendt. 1998

Yeomanry Cavalry, 2002

Customs and Inland Revenue, Comm
for reporting Progress, 1875

Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions

Agricultural Depression, 1397

Netterville Trust Property—The
Institution, 1157

Poor Law—Blessington Dispensary
Union) Medical Officer, 2036

Navy—Mr. John Clare, Case of, 1873

Supply—Convict Establishments in and the Colonies, 743; Motion
porting Progress, 754, 755

Court of Bankruptcy in Ireland, 15

Criminal Prosecutions, &c. (Irela
tion for reporting Progress, 1510

Metropolitan Police, &c. 729

Police, Counties and Boroughs (G
tain), 740

Police Courts of London and Sl
723

Prison Commissioners for Scotla
1491, 1493, 1494, 1502, 1505, 15

Prisons in England and Wales, 12
tion for reporting Progress, 127

Amendt. 1294, 1302, 1321

University Education (Ireland), 3R. 10

Patents—The Patents for Inventions Bill
Questions, Mr. B. Samuelson; Answer, The Attorney General May 22, 1906

Patriotic Fund, The—Powers of Commissioners

Question, Mr. J. R. Yorke; Answer, Colonel Stanley May 23, 1936

PEASE, Mr. J. W., Durham, S.
Customs and Inland Revenue, 2R. 774
Customs Department—Re-organization Scheme, 393

PEEL, Right Hon. Sir R., Tamworth
Africa, South—Civil and Military Commands, Explanation, 1241, 1242, 1247
Zulu War, 1378, 1552
Prerogative of the Crown, 240; Res. Motion for Adjournment, 320, 321

PEEL, Mr. A. W., Warwick Bo.
Railways—Railway Accidents—Adoption of Continuous Brakes, 1842

PELL, Mr. A., Leicestershire, S.
Law of Distress, Res. 65
Local Finance—Annual Statement—Public Works Loans Bill, 1909
London School Board Expenditure, Res. 1648

PERCY, Right Hon. Earl, Northumberland, N.
Criminal Law—Hanley, Alleged Cruelty at, 11
Summary Jurisdiction, Comm. cl. 64, 220

Persia—Retirement of the British Minister
Question, General Sir George Balfour; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer May 19, 685

PETERBOROUGH, Bishop of
Church of England—Glebe Lands, Motion for a Paper, 1427
Habitual Drunkards, Comm. cl. 6, 390

Petty Customs (Scotland) Abolition Act Amendment Bill
(The Earl of Airlie)

l. Royal Assent May 23 [42 Vict. c. 13]

Pier and Harbour Orders Confirmation Bill (Lord Henniker)

l. Read 2^o May 15 (No. 73)
Committee*; Report May 16
Read 3^o May 23

PIM, Captain B., Gravesend
"Princess Alice" Calamity—Proceedings at the Inquest, 1353
Thames River Traffic Committee—The Report, 1353

VOL. CCXLVI. [THIRD SERIES.]

PLAYFAIR, Right Hon. Mr. Lyon, Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities
College of Science, Dublin—Professor Gallo-way, 391

Medical Bills—Select Committee, 400
Metropolis—Local Taxation, Motion for a Select Committee, 1825

PLUNKET, Hon. D. R., Dublin University
University Education (Ireland), Leave, 504; 2R. 977

Poor Law Amendment Act (1876) Amendment Bill

(The Lord Norton)

l. Royal Assent May 23 [42 Vict. c. 12]

Poor Law—The Truck System—Dudley, &c.

Question, Mr. H. B. Sheridan; Answer, Mr. Solater-Booth May 27, 1356

Poor Removal

Select Committee nominated June 9; List of the Committee, 1542

POST OFFICE

MISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

Australian Colonies—Conveyance of Mails, Question, Mr. Baxter; Answer, Lord John Manners May 15, 397

China Mails, The, Question, Mr. Dalrymple; Answer, Lord John Manners May 22, 1007

Eastern Mail Contract, Questions, Sir George Campbell; Answers, Lord John Manners June 12, 1702

Mail Contract with the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Company, Question, Mr. J. Holms; Answer, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson June 12, 1720

Soldiers' Letters from South Africa, Questions, Mr. Oliver Walker, General Shute; Answer, Lord John Manners June 12, 1707

Telegraph Department

Female Clerks, Question, Mr. Chamberlain; Answer, Lord John Manners May 26, 1230

Telegraph Clerks—Post Office, Edinburgh, Question, Mr. M'Laren; Answer, Lord John Manners May 15, 401

The New International Post Card, Questions, Mr. Sullivan; Answers, Lord John Manners May 19, 692

POTTER, Mr. T. B., Rochdale
Ceylon—Food Scarcity, 1700

POWER, Mr. J. O'Connor, Mayo
Africa, South—Civil and Military Commands, 1260, 1262

Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 30, 426; cl. 32, Amendt. 459; cl. 36, 469; Motion for Adjournment, 473, 474; cl. 44, 1599

Army Estimates—Medical Establishments, &c. 1986, 1989

Military Law, Administration of, 1935, 1943

3 Y

[cont.]

POWER, Mr. J. O'Connor—cont.

Customs and Inland Revenue, Comm. cl. 23, 1880
 Ireland—Agricultural Depression, 1393
 Carrick-on-Suir Bridge, 1874
 Prerogative of the Crown, Res. 320, 323
 Supply—Civil Services and Revenue Departments, Motion for Adjournment, 1324, 1325
 Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Household, &c. 205
 Prison Commissioners for Scotland, &c. 1497
 Prisons in England and Wales, Motion for reporting Progress, 1312, 1322
 Secret Services, 155
 University Education (Ireland), 1030

POWER, Mr. R., Waterford
 Hares (Ireland), 2R. 506

POWERSCOURT, Viscount
 Tenant Right (Ireland), 2R. 804

POWIS, Earl of
 Cathedral Statutes, 2R. 387

"Princess Alice" Calamity—Proceedings at the Inquest
 Question, Captain Pim; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross May 27, 1353

Prisons Act—Perth Prison
 Questions, Mr. Macdonald; Answers, Mr. Assheton Cross May 9, 16

Prisons (Ireland) Act, Sec 27—The Prisons Board—Medical Officers
 Question, Mr. Errington; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther May 19, 685

Probate, Legacy, and Succession Duties
 Moved, "That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that in lieu of Probate and Administration Duty, which is now payable according to unequal rates, upon the personal estate of deceased persons, and in lieu of Legacy Duty, which is now payable at various rates and various times in respect of each separate gift by will, and each separate share of an intestate's estate, one Duty only should be levied, at a uniform rate, upon the value of the personal estate of every deceased person" (Mr. Dodds) May 20, 887

Amendt. to leave out from "expedient" and add "to reconsider and revise the progressive rates of Probate and Administration Duty, and to afford greater facilities for the assessment and settlement of Legacy and Succession Duties upon future or contingent events, and for the relief of executors, administrators, and trustees in respect of the same" (Mr. Gregory) v.; Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;" after debate, Question put; A. 59, N. 131; M. 72 (D. L. 105)

Words added; main Question, as amended, put; A. 131, N. 24; M. 107 (D. L. 106), and agreed to

Prosecution of Offences Bill

(The Lord Chancellor)

l. Read 2^a, after short debate May 27, 1

Public Health Act (1875) Amendment Bill (Mr. Alexander Brown, 1 well, Mr. Ryder)

c. Committee—R.F. May 26, 1326 [I

Public Health Act—Supervision of Slaughter-houses

Question, Sir Eardley Wilmot; Answer, Selater-Booth May 15, 394

Public Health (Scotland) Act Amendment Bill (Earl Cam

l. Read 1^a May 9

Read 2^a May 19

Committee; Report May 30

Read 3^a May 23

Royal Assent May 27 [42 Vict.

Public Health (Scotland) Prov Order (Bothwell) Bill

(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary

c. Read 2^a May 9 [Bill

Committee; Report May 19

Read 3^a May 22

l. Read 1^a (Lord Steward) May 23 (N

Read 2^a May 30

Committee; Report June 13

Read 3^a June 16

Public Health (Scotland) Prov Order (Castle Douglas) Bill

(The Lord Steward)

l. Read 2^a May 12 (N

Committee; Report May 13

Read 3^a May 15

Royal Assent May 23 [42 Vict. c

Public Works Loan Bill

Local Finance—Annual Statement, Q Mr. Pell, Mr. Chamberlain; Answer, Chancellor of the Exchequer June 16

Public Works Loans Commissioners Report

Question, General Sir George Balfour; Answer, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson 402

Racecourses (Metropolis) Bill

(The Viscount Enfield)

l. Moved, "That the Bill be now read May 12, 100

Amendt. to leave out ("now,") and add day six months" (The Lord St. Leon after debate, on Question, that ("&c.?" Cont. 84, Not-Cont. 57; M. 27

Division List, Cont. and Not-Cont.

Resolved in the Affirmative; Bill read

(No

Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (Killarney, &c.) Bill

(Mr. James Lowther, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland)

- c. Ordered; read 1^o * May 13 [Bill 178]
 Read 2^o * May 20
 Committee*; Report May 27
 Read 3^o * June 10
 l. Read 1^o * (Lord President) June 13 (No. 110)

Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (Waterford, &c.) Bill

(Mr. James Lowther, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland)

- c. Committee*; Report May 21 [Bill 133]
 Read 3^o * May 23
 l. Read 1^o * (Lord President) May 23 (No. 91)
 Read 2^o * May 30
 Committee*; Report June 13
 Read 3^o * June 16

Local Government (Poor Law) Provisional Orders Bill

(Mr. Salt, Mr. Scclater-Booth)

- c. Read 2^o * May 13 [Bill 155]
 Committee*; Report May 22
 Read 3^o * May 23
 l. Read 1^o * (Lord President) May 26 (No. 96)
 Read 2^o * June 16

Local Government Provisional Orders (Abergavenny Union, &c.) Bill

(Mr. Salt, Mr. Scclater-Booth)

- c. Committee*; Report May 26 [Bill 137]
 Read 3^o * May 27
 l. Read 1^o * (Lord President) May 27 (No. 103)
 Read 2^o * June 16

Local Government Provisional Orders (Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings) Bill (Mr. Salt, Mr. Scclater-Booth)

- c. Read 2^o * May 16 [Bill 159]
 Committee*; Report May 26
 Read 3^o * May 27
 l. Read 1^o * (Lord President) May 27 (No. 102)
 Read 2^o * June 16

Local Government Provisional Orders (Ashton-under-Lyne, &c.) Bill

(The Lord President)

- l. Read 1^o * May 9 (No. 79)
 Read 2^o * May 16
 Committee*; Report May 19
 Read 3^o * May 20
 Royal Assent May 23 [42 Vict. c. xliii]

Local Government Provisional Orders (Aspull, &c.) Bill

(Mr. Salt, Mr. Scclater-Booth)

- c. Read 2^o * May 20 [Bill 151]
 Committee*; Report June 9
 Considered* June 10
 Read 3^o * June 11
 l. Read 1^o * (Lord President) June 13 (No. 113)

Local Government Provisional Orders (Axminster Union, &c.) Bill

(Mr. Salt, Mr. Scclater-Booth)

- c. Read 2^o * May 14 [Bill 164]
 Committee*; Report May 22
 Read 3^o * May 23
 l. Read 1^o * (Lord President) May 26 (No. 94)
 Read 2^o * June 16

Local Government Provisional Orders (Aysgarth Union, &c.) Bill

(Mr. Salt, Mr. Scclater-Booth)

- c. Committee*; Report May 26 [Bill 142]
 Read 3^o * May 27
 l. Read 1^o * (Lord President) May 27 (No. 104)
 Read 2^o * June 16

Local Government Provisional Orders (Cartworth) Bill

(Mr. Salt, Mr. Scclater-Booth)

- c. Read 2^o * May 19 [Bill 168]
 Order for Committee discharged; Bill referred to the Committee of Selection May 26
 Report of Select Comm.* June 13

Local Government Provisional Orders (Castleton by Rochdale, &c.) Bill

(Mr. Salt, Mr. Scclater-Booth)

- c. Read 2^o * May 19 [Bill 160]
 Committee*; Report May 27
 Read 3^o * June 10
 l. Read 1^o * (Lord President) June 13 (No. 114)

London School Board Expenditure

Moved, "That the rapidly increasing expenditure of the London School Board requires the early attention of the Government, with the view of imposing on it some more effectual checks than appear at present to exist" (Mr. Reginald Yorke) June 10, 1874; after long debate, Debate adjourned

LONGFORD, Earl of

Army—Brigade Depot System, Res. 1217
 Army—Condition of the Army and Short Service System, Address for Papers, 1425
 Tenant Right (Ireland), 2R. 802

Lord Clerk Register (Scotland) Bill

(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Cross)

- c. Ordered; read 1^o * May 26 [Bill 196]

Lotteries, Illegal

Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland June 13, 1870

LOWE, Right Hon. R., London University

India—East India Revenue Accounts—Financial Statement, Comm. 1185
 Supply—Land Registry, 712
 University Education (Ireland), 2R. 992

RIPON, Marquess of

India—Telegraphic Communication with India,
Address for Papers, 824
Racecourses (Metropolis), 2R. 117

RITCHIE, Mr. C. T., Tower Hamlets

Customs Department—Re-organization Scheme,
393
London School Board Expenditure, Res. 1649
Sugar Industries, Nomination of Select Committee, 235, 236, 927

Rivers Conservancy Bill [H.L.]

(Mr. Selater-Booth)

c. Read 1^o May 13

[Bill 175]

RODWELL, Mr. B. B. H., Cambridgeshire

Felixstowe Railway and Pier, 2R. 1545
Law of Distress, Res. 62

ROSEBURY, Earl of

Racecourses (Metropolis), 2R. 113, 117

RUSSELL, Lord A., Tavistock

London School Board Expenditure, Res. 1649

RUSSELL, Sir C., Westminster

Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 40, 593

RUTLAND, Duke of

Metropolis—Gravel in the Parks, 120
State of the Country—Depression of Trade, 813

RYLANDS, Mr. P., Burnley

Africa, South—Miscellaneous Questions
Re-inforcements from India, 1141
Royal Marines, 1019
Zulu War, 1384

Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 39,
576; cl. 40, 582, 594; cl. 41, 602; cl. 42,
605, 614, 842; cl. 44, 866; Motion for reporting Progress, 885, 886, 1574, 1580, 1581, 1582, 1587

Army Estimates—Military Law, Administration of, 1928, 1941

Customs and Inland Revenue, Comm. cl. 15,
1520, 1532; Consid. 2027

Parliament—Business of the House, 20, 1722

Supply—Broadmoor Criminal Lunatic Asylum,
Amendt. 1449, 1450, 1460

Court of Bankruptcy in Ireland, Motion for reporting Progress, 1514, 1516

Courts of Law and Justice, Scotland, 1465
Land Registry, Amendt. 707

Lord Advocate, &c. Scotland, 1461, 1463

Metropolitan Police, &c. 727, 728

Police, Counties and Boroughs (Great Britain), 736

Police Courts of London and Sheerness, 719
Prisons in England and Wales, 1271, 1281,
1321

Secret Services, Amendt. 151

Stationery, &c. 140

Superannuation and Retired Allowances,
&c. 1518

Woods, Forests, &c. 149

ST. ALBANS, Duke of Spain—Contraband Trade at Gibraltar of the "Roselyn," 1898

ST. LEONARDS, Lord

Racecourses (Metropolis), 2R. Amendt

SALISBURY, Marquess of (Secre-State for Foreign Affairs)

Children's Dangerous Performances, 1408

China—Chefoo Convention, 5

Foreign Policy of Her Majesty's Govt
530, 539, 554, 556, 560

Treaty of Berlin—Balkan Fortresses,
Greek Frontier, 555

Treaty of Berlin—Article 22—Occup
Bulgaria and Eastern Roumelia, M
Correspondence, 661

Turkey—Crete—Disturbances, 1411

Salmon Disease (England and Scott

Question, Captain Milne-Home; Ans
Asheton Cross May 27, 1352

Salmon Fishery Law Amendment

Bill (Colonel Kingscote, Sir Joseph Mr. Stafford Howard)

c. Ordered * May 14

Read 1^o * May 16

Read 2^o June 16, 2030

[Bill

Samoa Islands, The—Treaty with many Question, Colonel Mure; Answer, Mr.

May 15, 400

SAMUELSON, Mr. B., Banbury

Patents—Patents for Inventions Bill, 1

SAMUELSON, Mr. H. B., Frome

Army—The 42nd Regiment, 1915
Hours of Polling (Boroughs), 2R. 1685

SANDON, Right Hon. Viscount

sident of the Board of T

Liverpool

Agricultural Statistics—Cora Returns,
"General Statistical Abstract"—Foreign

on British Produce, 1140
Merchant Shipping Acts—"Kain v. F.

1004

Shipping Office Fees, 131

Railway Commission—Prolongation of 569, 1914

Railways — Railway Accidents — Ado
Continuous Brakes, 1860

SCLATER-BOOTH, Right Hon. G. (

dent of the Local Gover Board), Hampshire, N.

Blind and Deaf-Mute Children (Edu
403

Metropolis—Local Taxation, Motion fo
lect Committee, 1821

Noxious Gases, 2R. 644, 647

[

Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (Killarney, &c.) Bill

(Mr. James Lowther, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland)

- c. Ordered; read 1^o * May 13 [Bill 178]
Read 2^o * May 20
Committee *; Report May 27
Read 3^o * June 10
- l. Read 1^a * (Lord President) June 13 (No. 110)

Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (Waterford, &c.) Bill

(Mr. James Lowther, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland)

- c. Committee *; Report May 21 [Bill 133]
Read 3^o * May 22
- l. Read 1^a * (Lord President) May 23 (No. 91)
Read 2^a * May 30
Committee *; Report June 13
Read 3^a * June 16

Local Government (Poor Law) Provisional Orders Bill

(Mr. Salt, Mr. Sclater-Booth)

- c. Read 2^o * May 13 [Bill 155]
Committee *; Report May 22
Read 3^o * May 23
- l. Read 1^a * (Lord President) May 26 (No. 96)
Read 2^a * June 16

Local Government Provisional Orders (Abergavenny Union, &c.) Bill

(Mr. Salt, Mr. Sclater-Booth)

- c. Committee *; Report May 26 [Bill 137]
Read 3^o * May 27
- l. Read 1^a * (Lord President) May 27 (No. 103)
Read 2^a * June 16

Local Government Provisional Orders (Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings) Bill (Mr. Salt, Mr. Sclater-Booth)

- c. Read 2^o * May 16 [Bill 159]
Committee *; Report May 26
Read 3^o * May 27
- l. Read 1^a * (Lord President) May 27 (No. 102)
Read 2^a * June 16

Local Government Provisional Orders (Ashton-under-Lyne, &c.) Bill

(The Lord President)

- l. Read 1^a * May 9 (No. 79)
Read 2^a * May 16
Committee *; Report May 19
Read 3^a * May 20
Royal Assent May 23 [42 Vict. c. xliii]

Local Government Provisional Orders (Aspull, &c.) Bill

(Mr. Salt, Mr. Sclater-Booth)

- c. Read 2^o * May 20 [Bill 151]
Committee *; Report June 9
Considered * June 10
Read 3^o * June 11
- l. Read 1^a * (Lord President) June 13 (No. 113)

Local Government Provisional Orders (Axminster Union, &c.) Bill

(Mr. Salt, Mr. Sclater-Booth)

- c. Read 2^o * May 14 [Bill 154]
Committee *; Report May 22
Read 3^o * May 23
- l. Read 1^a * (Lord President) May 26 (No. 94)
Read 2^a * June 16

Local Government Provisional Orders (Aysgarth Union, &c.) Bill

(Mr. Salt, Mr. Sclater-Booth)

- c. Committee *; Report May 26 [Bill 142]
Read 3^o * May 27
- l. Read 1^a * (Lord President) May 27 (No. 104)
Read 2^a * June 16

Local Government Provisional Orders (Cartworth) Bill

(Mr. Salt, Mr. Sclater-Booth)

- c. Read 2^o * May 19 [Bill 158]
Order for Committee discharged; Bill referred to the Committee of Selection May 26
Report of Select Comm. * June 13

Local Government Provisional Orders (Castleton by Rochdale, &c.) Bill

(Mr. Salt, Mr. Sclater-Booth)

- c. Read 2^o * May 19 [Bill 160]
Committee *; Report May 27
Read 3^o * June 10
- l. Read 1^a * (Lord President) June 13 (No. 114)

London School Board Expenditure

Moved, "That the rapidly increasing expenditure of the London School Board requires the early attention of the Government, with the view of imposing on it some more effectual checks than appear at present to exist" (Mr. Reginald Yorke) June 10, 1874; after long debate, Debate adjourned

LONGFORD, Earl of

Army—Brigade Depot System, Res. 1217
Army—Condition of the Army and Short Service System, Address for Papers, 1425
Tenant Right (Ireland), 2R. 802

Lord Clerk Register (Scotland) Bill

(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Cross)

- c. Ordered; read 1^o * May 26 [Bill 196]

Lotteries, Illegal

Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland June 13, 1870

LOWE, Right Hon. R., London University

India—East India Revenue Accounts—Financial Statement, Comm. 1185
Supply—Land Registry, 712
University Education (Ireland), 2R. 992

SHUTE, General C. C., Brighton

- Army Discipline and Regulation—Booty of War, 1701
- Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 30, 426; cl. 39, 577; cl. 40, 595; cl. 44, 865, 1567, 1573, 1575
- Army Estimates—Military Law, Administration of, 1930, 1932, 1942
- Yeomanry Cavalry, 2003
- Army Regulation Act—Cashiered Purchase Officers, 1807
- General National Fund for the Relief of Families of Soldiers, Sailors, &c. 1806
- India—Afghanistan—The War—General Roberts' Despatch, 122, 1233
- Kirwee Prize Money, 1701
- Post Office—Soldiers' Letters from South Africa, 1708

SIDEBOTTOM, Mr. T. H., Staleybridge

- India—East India Revenue Accounts—Financial Statement, Comm. 1178

SIMON, Mr. Serjeant J., Dewsbury

- Supply—Convict Establishments in England and the Colonies, 749
- Prisons in England and Wales, 1273

Slave Trade in South Africa—Treaty with Portugal

- Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, Mr. Bourke June 12, 1703

SMITH, Right Hon. W. H. (First Lord of the Admiralty), Westminster

- Admiralty—Director of Naval Construction, 1359
- Admiralty and War Office Regulation Act—The Secretariat of the Admiralty, 393
- Africa, South—Forces in Zululand, 1008
- Zulu War—Royal Marines, 1019
- Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 32, 436, 438
- Fishery Laws—Violation by Steam Trawlers, 1808
- Navy—Miscellaneous Questions
- Coaling at St. Vincent's, 1915
- H.M.S. "Iron Duke," 182
- Mr. W. Froude, the late, 1806
- Pensions of Sergeants of Royal Marines, 1706

SMOLLETT, Mr. P. B., Cambridge

- India—East India Revenue Accounts—Financial Statement, Comm. 1753

SOLICITOR GENERAL, The (Sir H. S. Giffard), Launceston

- Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 44, 1577
- Customs and Inland Revenue, Comm. cl. 23, 1879, 1880; cl. 25, 1883

Spain

- Contraband Trade at Gibraltar—Cam "Rosslyn," Question, Observation Duke of St. Albans; Reply, Earl of
- Observations, Lord Napier of June 16, 1898
- Labour in Cuba, Question, Mr. Er
- Answer, Mr. Bourke May 12, 124

SPEAKER, The (Right Hon. H. BRAND), Cambridgeshire

- Admiralty—Director of Naval Cons 1359
- Africa, South—Miscellaneous Question Civil and Military Commands, Exp 1242
- Transvaal, 1266
- Zulu War—Alleged Cruelties of the Troops, 1717
- Army Organization—Departmental Co 1562
- Blind and Deaf-Mute Children (Ed Consid. 226
- "Home Rule" Party, 1040
- India—East India Revenue Accounts—Financial Statement, Comm. 1092; Petitioned, 1723
- India—Indian Budget, 130
- Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions
- Intoxicating Liquors, 1201
- Religious Disturbances at Omey County Galway, 686, 690
- Ribandism, 1230
- Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) (No. 338
- Metropolis (Little Coram Street, Bloc Wells Street, Poplar, and Great Pets Westminster.) Improvement Provisi ders Confirmation, Comm. 1401
- Parliament—Rules and Practice of the 1363
- Prerogative of the Crown, 240, 241; F 264, 265, 286
- Summary Jurisdiction, Consid. 1099
- Thames River (Prevention of Flood 1135
- Trade, State of—Statement of the Minister, 1020
- Trustees Relief, 2R. 507
- University Education (Ireland), 102 1025

SPENCER, Earl

- Hares (Ireland), Comm. 1897

SPINKS, Mr. Serjeant F. L., Oldham

- Hours of Polling (Boroughs), 2R. 168

Spirits Bill

- (Mr. Attorney General, Sir Henry Selwin-
- c. Acts read; considered in Committee; tion agreed to, and reported; Bill read 1^o June 9 [Bil

STACPOOLE, Mr. J. W., Ennis

- Africa, South—Zulu War—Fight at Rorke's Drift, 1916
- Army—Beards, 1916
- Compulsory Retirement—Royal Warrant of May, 1878, 1707
- Army Estimates—Volunteer Corps, 2013
- Supply—Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Household, &c. 204, 206

STANHOPE, Earl

- Church of England—Glebe Lands, Motion for a Paper, 1428
- Disqualification by Medical Relief, Comm. 1340
- Supply of Drink on Credit, 1R. 239
- Treaty of Berlin—Balkan Fortresses, 227

STANHOPE, Hon. E. (Under Secretary of State for India), Lincolnshire, Mid.

- Army—The Warrant of August 13th, 1877—Supersession of General Officers, 1136
- British Indian Association, Res. 1144
- East India (Loan), Comm. Amendt. 1199, 1200; 2R. 1804
- India—Miscellaneous Questions
 - Afghanistan—The War—Execution of Prisoners of War, 18, 19;—General Roberts' Despatch, 123, 1234
 - Bombay, Disturbances in, 1009
 - Famine Commission, 126
 - Four-and-a-half per Cent Loan Allotment, 694
 - Kirwee Prize Money, 1701
 - Petition of Mr. W. Taylor—Sir F. Halliday, 1911
 - Return of Ecclesiastical Salaries, 1430
 - Village "Panchayats" or Courts of Arbitration, 836
- India—East India Revenue Accounts—Financial Statement, Comm. Motion for Adjournment, 1040, 1198, 1727, 1743, 1787, 1794, 1797
- Indian Marine, 2R. 792, 793, 2028

STANLEY OF ALDERLEY, Lord

- China—Chefoo Convention, 5
- Habitual Drunkards, Comm. cl. 3, 390
- Landed Estates Court (Ireland), Motion for Returns, 665
- Prosecution of Offences, 2R. 1338
- Straits Settlements, Administrator of the—The Sultan Johore, Motion for Papers, 1341, 1349

STANLEY, Right Hon. Colonel F. A. (Secretary of State for War), Lancashire, N.

- Afghanistan and Zululand—The Wars—Number of British Troops, 699
- Africa, South—Civil and Military Commands, Explanation, 1249, 1257
- Africa, South—Zulu War—Miscellaneous Questions
 - 1552, 1553
 - Forces in Zululand, 1008
 - Lord Chelmsford's Despatches, 1139
 - Re-inforcements, 1018
 - Re-inforcements from India, 1141

[cont.]

STANLEY, Right Hon. Colonel F. A.—cont.

- Returns of Killed, &c. 1853
- Rorke's Drift, Fight at, 1916
- Royal Marines, 1019
- Transport Service in Natal, 838, 839
- Army—Miscellaneous Questions
 - Army Discipline and Regulation—Booby of War, 1701
 - Army Regulation Act—Cashiered Purchase Officers, 1807
 - Balances of Deceased Soldiers, 1006
 - Beards, 1916
 - Commissariat and Transport Departments, 12
 - Compulsory Retirement—Royal Warrant of May, 1878, 1707
 - Court of Inquiry at Netley in 1873, 837
 - Discharged Soldiers, Civil Employment for, 1011
 - 88th Regiment—Volunteers, 1011, 1012
 - 88th Regiment—Foreign Service, 694
 - First-Class Army Reserve, 1012, 1811
 - Flogging in the Army, 837
 - 42nd Regiment, 1915, 1916
 - Medical Service—Invalided Medical Officers, 1697
 - Organization—The Departmental Committee, 1551, 1557
 - Regimental Commands—The Five Years' Rule, 1010
 - 60th Rifles—Court Martial, 234, 402
 - Soldiers in Uniform, 1870
 - Veterinary Warrant of May 1st, 1878, 1007
 - Volunteering from the Militia to the Line, 239
- Army Discipline and Regulation, 17; Comm. cl. 30, 421, 425, 432; cl. 31, 434, 435; cl. 32, 437, 441, 450, 451, 460, 462; cl. 34, 463; cl. 36, 464, 469, 472, 473; cl. 38, 572, 573; cl. 39, 575; cl. 40, 578, 579, 585, 589, 590; cl. 41, 599, 600, 602; cl. 42, 604, 605, 606, 609, 612, 841, 842, 854, 855; cl. 43, 856; cl. 44, 858, 864, 865, 871, 885, 886, 1556, 1564, 1565, 1569, 1572, 1576, 1580, 1586
- Army Estimates—Divine Service, 1920, 1921, 1963, 1968, 1969, 1974, 1977
- Medical Establishments, &c. 1952, 1958
- Military Law—Administration of, 1922, 1925, 1933, 1939, 1944, 1948, 1949
- Militia, 1994, 2000
- Volunteer Corps, 2025, 2027
- Yeomanry Cavalry, 2002, 2003
- General National Fund for Relief of Families of Soldiers, Sailors, &c. 1806
- Patriotic Fund—Powers of Commissioners, 1136

STANTON, Mr. A. J., Stroud

- Customs and Inland Revenue, Comm. cl. 24, 1881

State of the Country

- Depression of Trade*, Question; Observations, The Duke of Rutland; Reply, The Earl of Beaconsfield May 20, 813
- Statement of the Prime Minister*, Question, Observations, Mr. Mac Iver; Reply, Mr. Speaker May 22, 1019

Statute Law Revision (Ireland) Bill

(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Mr. James Louth)

- c. Read 3^o May 9 [Bill 132]
 l. Read 1^o (The Lord Chancellor) May 12
 Read 2^o May 23, 1133 (No. 80)
 Committee²; Report May 27
 Read 3^o May 29

STEVENSON, Mr. J. C., South Shields

Supply—Police, Counties and Boroughs (Great Britain), 738

STEWART, Mr. J., Greenock

Supply—Local Taxation in Scotland, 182
 Reformatory, Industrial, &c. Schools, Amendt. 1435, 1436

STEWART, Mr. M. J., Wigton Bo.

Army Estimates—Volunteer Corps, 2005
 India—East India Revenue Accounts—Financial Statement, Comm. 1802
 Supply—Fishery Board in Scotland, 160
 Local Taxation in Scotland, 183

Straits Settlements—The Sultan of Johor

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Copy of the Treaty of 1855 between the Sultan of Johor and his Tumonggong, and for the correspondence respecting Muar since the death of the late Sultan of Johor" (The Lord Stanley of Alderley) May 27, 1341; after short debate, Motion agreed to

STRATHNAIRN, Lord

Army—Brigade Dépôt System, Res. 1216
 Army—Condition of the Army and Short Service System, Address for Papers, 1418, 1425

Sugar Industries—The Select Committee

Question, Mr. Ritchie; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer May 13, 235
 Moved, "That the Select Committee do consist of 17 Members" (Mr. Ritchie) May 20, 925; after short debate, Question put, and agreed to; List of the Committee, 929

SULLIVAN, Mr. A. M., Louth Co.

Africa, South—Zulu War—Miscellaneous Questions 1364
 Alleged Cruelties by the British Troops, 1712
 Civil and Military Commands, Explanation, Motion for Adjournment, 1242, 1265
 Instructions of Sir Garnet Wolseley, 1357
 Overtures of Peace, 1235
 Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 44, 872, 875
 Army Estimates—Divine Service, 1920
 Medical Establishments, &c. 1971, 1972, 1973, 1989
 Military Law, Administration of, 1938, 1942, 1947
 Criminal Law—Case of Ryan, 1812
 Customs Re-organization, 1703

SULLIVAN, Mr. A. M.—cont.

Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions
 Agricultural Depression, 1394
 High Court of Justice—Business in the Chancery Division, 1703
 Intoxicating Liquors, 395
 Netterville Trust Property—The Louth Institution, 1153
 Religious Disturbances in Omev Island, County Galway, 691
 Irish Church Temporalities Commissioners—Mr. Ball, 395, 396
 Post Office—New International Post Card, 692, 693
 Supply—Convict Establishments in England and the Colonies, 751
 Court of Bankruptcy in Ireland, 1514
 Fishery Board in Scotland, 174, 175
 Police, Counties and Boroughs (Great Britain), 742
 Prison Commissioners for Scotland, &c. 1508, 1509
 Prisons in England and Wales, 1295, 1296
 Stationery, &c. 143
 University Education (Ireland), Leave, 504, 1025

Summary Jurisdiction Bill

(Mr. Secretary Cross, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Solicitor General, Sir Matthew Ridley)

- c. Committee (on re-comm.)—r.p. May 9, 88
 Committee; Report May 12, 214 [Bill 136]
 Moved, "That the Bill be now taken into Consideration" May 22, 1093
 Amendt. to leave out from "That," and add "in the opinion of this House, compensation should be made to clerks of the peace, now paid by fees, for the diminution of their incomes which will be caused by the provisions of this Bill" (Mr. Morgan Lloyd) v.; Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;" after short debate, Question, put, and agreed to Main Question, "That the Bill be now taken into Consideration," put, and agreed to; Bill, as amended, considered [Bill 159]
 Read 3^o May 23
 l. Read 1^o (Lord Chancellor) May 26 (No. 97)

SUPPLY

Considered in Committee May 12, 136—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—CLASS II.—SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF PUBLIC DEPARTMENTS
 Resolutions reported May 13, 327; after short debate, Resolutions agreed to
 Considered in Committee May 19, 700—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—CLASS III.—LAW AND JUSTICE—Resolutions reported May 22
 Considered in Committee May 26, 1366—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—CLASS III.—LAW AND JUSTICE—Resolutions reported May 27
 Considered in Committee June 9, 1434—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—CLASS III.—LAW AND JUSTICE—CLASS VI.—SUPERANNUATION AND RETIRED ALLOWANCES, AND GRATUITIES FOR CHARITABLE AND OTHER PURPOSES—Resolutions reported June 12
 Considered in Committee June 16, 1919—ARMY ESTIMATES—Resolutions reported June 17

Supply of Drink on Credit Bill [H.L.]
(The Earl Stanhope)

l. Presented; read 1st May 13, 229 (No. 84)
Read 2nd May 29

Supreme Court of Judicature Acts Amendment Bill [H.L.] (Mr. Attorney General)

c. Read 2nd May 12 [Bill 134]
Committee—R.P. June 9, 1541

Supreme Court of Judicature Acts [Salaries, &c.]

Considered in Committee—Resolution thereon
May 16, 652

Supreme Court of Judicature (Officers) Bill [H.L.] (The Lord Chancellor)

l. Presented; read 1st May 9 (No. 76)

SYNAN, Mr. E. J., Limerick Co.

Law of Distress, Res. 67
University Education (Ireland), 2R. Motion
for Adjournment, 1000

TALBOT, Mr. J. G. (Secretary to the Board of Trade), Oxford University
Thames River Traffic Committee—The Report, 1353

TAYLOR, Mr. P. A., Leicester Bo.

Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 30, 429
Criminal Law—John Stanley, Case of, 231
Manlaughter of a Game-Watcher—The Sentence, 392
Summary Jurisdiction, Comm. cl. 10, Amendt.
90; cl. 11, Amendt. 93

Telegraphs, Electric—"The Government and the Telegraph Companies"—
Purchase of the United Kingdom
Electric Telegraph Company

Question, Mr. Fortescue Harrison; Answer,
The Chancellor of the Exchequer May 19,
697

Tenant Right (Ireland) Bill

(The Earl of Belmore)

l. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2nd"
May 20, 795

Amendt. to leave out ("now,") and add ("this day six months") (The Viscount Lifford);
after debate, on Question, that ("now,") &c.?
resolved in the negative; and Bill to be read
2nd on this day six months (No. 35)

TENNANT, Mr. R., Leeds

Railways—Railway Accidents—Adoption of Continuous Brakes, 1844

Terms of Removal (Scotland) Bill

(*Mr. Montgomerie, Sir William Cuninghame, Mr.
Mackintosh, Sir Windham Anstruther*)

c. Ordered; read 1st May 19 [Bill 189]

Thames River (Prevention of Floods) Bill
(by Order)

c. Moved, "That the Bill be now taken into Consideration" May 20, 825

Amendt. to leave out "now," and add "upon Tuesday the 24th of June next" (Colonel Beresford); Question proposed, "That 'now,' &c.;" after short debate, Amendt. withdrawn

Main Question put, and agreed to; Bill, as amended, considered

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3rd" (Sir James M'Garel Hogg) May 23, 1134; after short debate, Motion agreed to (Prince of Wales's Consent, as Duke of Cornwall, signified); Bill read 3rd

Thames River Traffic Committee—The Report

Questions, Captain Pim, Lord Francis Hervey;
Answers, Mr. J. G. Talbot May 27, 1353

TORR, Mr. J., Liverpool

Summary Jurisdiction, Comm. cl. 54, 219

TOTTENHAM, Colonel C., New Ross

Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) (No. 2), 2R.
352

TRACY, Hon. F. S. A. Hanbury-, Montgomery

Copyright, Law of, 1706

Tramways Orders Confirmation Bill

(Mr. John G. Talbot, Viscount Sandon)

c. Ordered; read 1st May 16 [Bill 187]
Read 2nd May 27

Treaty of Berlin

MISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

Article 23—The European Provinces of Turkey,
Questions, Sir George Campbell; Answers,
The Chancellor of the Exchequer May 16,
398; June 9, 1430

Balkan Fortresses, The, Question, Mr. Baxter;
Answer, Mr. Bourke May 12, 127; Question, Earl Stanhope; Answer, The Marquess of Salisbury May 13, 227

Eastern Roumelia, Questions, Mr. Hanbury,
Sir Alexander Gordon; Answers, Mr. Bourke
May 9, 9

Execution of Articles, Question, Sir William Harcourt; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer May 16, 567

Greek Frontier, The, Questions, Mr. W. Cartwright, Mr. Monk, Sir Charles W. Dilke;
Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer,
Mr. Bourke May 9, 14; Question, Observations, The Earl of Morley; Reply, The Marquess of Salisbury May 19, 654; Question, Mr. Laing; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer May 22, 1005

Treaty of Berlin—Article 22—Occupation of Bulgaria and Eastern Roumelia

Moved, "That the Correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and other Powers on Article 22 of the Treaty of Berlin be laid upon the Table" (The Lord Stratheden and Campbell) May 19, 655; after short debate, Motion withdrawn

TURBO, Lord

Africa, South—Zulu War—Condition of the Regiments, 666, 694;—Re-inforcements, 381
Army—Army Organization—The Committee, 1416, 1417, 1901
Army—Brigade Dépôt System, Res. 1224
Army—Condition of the Army and Short Service System, Address for Papers, 1421

Trustee Acts Consolidation and Amendment Bill (Mr. Osborne Morgan, Mr. Gregory, Mr. Alfred Marten, Sir Henry Jackson)

c. Read 3^o * May 23 [Bill 106]
l. Read 1^o * (Lord Selborne) May 26 (No. 98)

Trustees Relief Bill

(Mr. Wheelhouse, Sir George Bowyer, Sir Eardley Wilmot, Mr. Isaac)
c. 2R. deferred May 15, 507 [Bill 145]

TurkeyMISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

Anglo-Turkish Convention, The—Consular Appointments in Asia Minor, Question, Mr. J. Holms; Answer, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson May 26, 1237
Anti-Slave Trade Treaty, Question, Mr. W. E. Forster; Answer, Mr. Bourke May 26, 1238
Consul Blunt's Report, Question, Lord Eleho; Answer, Mr. Bourke May 27, 1362
Crete—Reported Disturbances, Question, Observations, Lord Colchester; Reply, The Marquess of Salisbury May 29, 1408
The Turkish Guaranteed Loan, 1855, Questions, Mr. Dodson, Mr. Monk; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer June 12, 1704

[See titles Treaty of Berlin—Egypt]

University Education (Ireland) Bill

(The O'Connor Don, Mr. Kavanagh, Mr. Shaw, Mr. Mitchell Henry, Lord Charles Beresford, Mr. Parnell)

c. Observations, The O'Connor Don; Reply, The Chancellor of the Exchequer May 13, 325
Motion for Leave (The O'Connor Don) May 15, 475; after debate, Motion agreed to; Bill ordered; read 1^o * [Bill 183]
Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o * " May 21, 930
Amendt. to leave out from "That," and add "while this House recognises that the funds set free by the disestablishment of the Irish Church should be devoted to the benefit of the people of Ireland, provided they are not again applied to the support of any sectarian religion, it is not desirable to devote additional public funds to the further promotion of higher education in Ireland till adequate provision is first made for elementary teaching in that Country without aid from Imperial funds exceeding that given to other parts of the United Kingdom" (Sir George Campbell) v.; Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;" after long debate, Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned" (Mr. Symes) after further short debate, Motion agreed to Debate adjourned

University Education (Ireland) Bill—cont.

Question, Observations, The O'Connor Don Reply, The Chancellor of the Exchequer May 22, 1020; Moved, "That this House do now adjourn" (Mr. Shaw); after debate Motion withdrawn

Valuation of Lands and Assessments (Scotland) Bill

(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Cross)

c. Read 3^o * May 12 [Bill 144]
Committee; Report May 19, 783

Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Amendment Bill (Sir Windham Anstruther)

(Mr. Campbell-Bannerman, Sir Graham Montgomery)
c. Considered * May 9 [Bill 16]
Read 3^o * May 12
l. Read 1^o * (Lord Stewart of Garlies) May 13
Read 2^o * May 23 (No. 83)

VERNER, Mr. E. W., Armagh Co.
Ribandism (Ireland), 1228

Victoria—The Constitutional Question

Question, Mr. A. Mills; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach June 16, 1914

Volunteer Corps (Ireland) Bill

(Mr. O'Clery, Major Nolan, Lord Francis Conyngham, Major O'Beirne)

c. Committee *; Report June 9 [Bills 5-26]

WADDY, Mr. S. D., Barnstaple

Afghanistan and Zululand—The War—Member of British Troops, 699
Africa, South—Civil and Military Commission
Explanation, 1246
Forces in Zululand, 1008
Artizans' Dwellings Act, 1868—Private Dwelling Grounds, 1721
Common Law Procedure and Judicature Amendment, 2R. 1201

WALKER, Mr. Oliver, Worcestershire
Post Office—Soldiers' Letters from Africa, 1707

WARD, Dr. M. F., Galway
University Education (Ireland), 1039

[cont.]

WATERLOW, Sir S. H., Maidstone
Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) (No. 2), 2R.
Amendt. 336, 338

WAVENEY, Lord
Army—Army Organization—Departmental
Committee, 1907
Army—Condition of the Army and Short Service System, Address for Papers, 1425
Parliament—Standing Orders Nos. 95 and 96,
1128, 1129, 1130, 1133
West Donegal Railway, Comm. 1335

WAYS AND MEANS

MISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

The Annual Financial Statement, Question,
Mr. J. G. Hubbard; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer June 12, 1897
The National Finances and Treaties—Control of Parliament, Question, Mr. Newdegate;
Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer
May 12, 1893

WAYS AND MEANS

Considered in Committee May 15
Resolved, That, towards making good the Supply granted to Her Majesty for the service of the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, the sum of £8,694,816 be granted out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom
Resolution reported, and agreed to May 16
[See title Consolidated Fund (No. 3) Bill]

WEDDERBURN, Sir D., Haddington Burghs
Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 41,
600
British Indian Association, Res. 1144
Customs and Inland Revenue, Comm. cl. 25, 1882
East India Loan (£5,000,000), 2R. 1803
Fishery Laws—Violation by Steam Trawlers, 1807
Supply—Local Taxation in Scotland, 189

Wellington College—The Commission
Question, Mr. J. R. Yorke; Answer, Mr.
Assheton Cross May 27, 1862

West Donegal Railway Bill [H.L.]
l. Committee, after short debate May 27, 1831

West India Loans Bill

(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Henry Selwyn-Ibbetson)

- c. Resolution in Committee May 8
Resolution reported, and agreed to; Bill ordered; read 1^o May 9 [Bill 167]
Read 2^o May 12
Committee*; Report May 13
Read 3^o May 14
l. Read 1^o (Lord President) May 15 (No. 85)
Read 2^o May 30

Westminster Improvement Commissioners
Question, Mr. J. R. Yorke; Answer, Mr.
Gerard Noel May 22, 1914

WHEELHOUSE, Mr. W. St. James, Leeds
Army—58th Regiment—Foreign Service, 694
Criminal Code—Memorandum of the Lord
Chief Justice, 1915
Hours of Polling (Boroughs), 2R. 1671
Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) (No. 2), 2R.
355, 357
Trustees Relief, 2R. 507

WHITBREAD, Mr. S., Bedford
Africa, South—Civil and Military Commands,
Explanation, 1251, 1252

WHITWELL, Mr. J., Kendal

Africa, South—Estimate of Military Expenditure, 401
Army Discipline and Regulation, Comm. cl. 32, 453
Army Estimates—Volunteer Corps, 2027
Yeomanry Cavalry, 2002
Courts of Justice Building Act (1865) Amendment, 2R. 225
Customs and Inland Revenue, Comm. cl. 15,
1530; cl. 24, 1882; cl. 25, 1883
Egypt—Mr. Vivian—Papers, 1914
Indian Marine, 2R. Motion for Adjournment, 792
Summary Jurisdiction, Comm. cl. 16, 97
Supply—Broadmoor Criminal Lunatic Asylum,
1457
Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, &c. Amendt. 207, 211
Convict Establishments in England and the Colonies, 751, 753
County Courts, 701, 702
Fishery Board in Scotland, 167
Land Registry, 708
Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, &c. 197
Police, Counties and Boroughs (Great Britain), 732
Prison Commissioners for Scotland, &c.
1490
Registrar General's Office, Scotland, 180
Stationery, &c. 147
Superannuation and Retired Allowances,
&c. Motion for reporting Progress, 1517 Unreformed Municipal Corporations—Report of the Commission, 1720

WILLIAMS, Mr. B. T., Carmarthen
Law of Distress, Res. 55
Thames River (Prevention of Floods), Consid.
826

WILMOT, Sir H., Derbyshire, S.
Army Estimates—Volunteer Corps, 2012

WILMOT, Sir J. E., Warwickshire, S.
Criminal Law—Edmund Galley, Case of, 16
India—Petition of Mr. W. Tayler—Sir F. Halliday, 1910
Italy—Italian Police, 1548
Metropolis—Public Roads, State of Repair of, 696
Public Health Act—Supervision of Slaughterhouses, 394

